filled with joyes and woes interchangeably, his troden-down sorrows began again to spring, and those perils which he had pulled up by the roots (as he hoped) gave him an alter-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased GOD to take the witness of *David*s own mouth against him, as David himself did against the Analekites, which pretended to have slain Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded unto him his own error in the person of another, to wit, of him that took the poor mans sheep that had none else, the bearer being Lord of many; He then vowed it to the living Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced; yet he delivered him Gods justice together with his mercy in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall never depart from thy house, &c. because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slain Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soon after this, David lost the child of adultery which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his own son Amnon, being in love with his half sister Tamar, by the advice of his cousin-german the son of Shimeah *David*s brother, possessed her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a careless and despiteful manner. Two years after which foul and incestuous act, Abalom caused him to be murdered at the feast of his sheep-shearing: not perchance in revenge of Tamars ravishment alone; but having it in his heart to usurp the Kingdom, in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Ammon, he thought his affairs greatly advanced by his destruction. So the one brother having ravished his own sister, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice first made his own brother drunken, and then slaughtered him, which done, he fled away, and lived under the safeguard of Talmi King of Geshur, near Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abalom by the invention of Joab (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his son) was brought again first to the Kings favour, and then to his presence; he began instantly to practise against David his father, seeking by the pretence of common justice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equity, to win unto himself a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction threat-ned by the Lord as a punishment of *David*s sin.

The company which Abalom gathered at the first were but 200. men: which he carried with him from Hiersusalem to Hebron, pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired unto him, and many troops of people from all places, he proclaimed himself King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawful Prince) accepted so readily, that David doubting to be set upon on the sudden, durst not trust himself in his own City of Hiersusalem, nor in any other walled town for fear of surprize: but incamped in the fields and deserts with some 600. of his guard, and few else. The Priests he left in Hiersusalem with the Ark of God, from whom he desired to be advertised of those things that chanced; to whom he directed Hushai his trusty friend, and servant, praying him to make himself in all his outward actions and counsels of *Abalom*s party and confederacy, thereby the better to discover unto him the purposes of Achitophel, a revolting Counsellour, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Aephibosheth the son of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred *David*s prosperity had smothered, but his adversity illighted) holding himself upon the advantage of a mountain side, cast stones at David, and most delightfully cursed him to his face: but David attending no private revenges, forbade Abishai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his revenge, to his son Salomon. Abalom being now possessed of Hiersusalem, was advised by Achitophel to use his fathers concubines in some public place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being persuaded, they would then resolutely adhere to Abalom and his cause, without fear of being given up upon a reconciliation between them. This salvage and impious (though crafty counsel) Achitophel indeed urged for his own respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction, who most of all other inflamed Abalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: Thou wilt raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lie with thy wives in the sight of the Sun: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the Sun. He also gave advice to Abalom, Abalom, that himself with an Army of 12000. men might be employed at the instant for the surprizing of David; which had willingly been embraced by Abalom, had not Hishai Davids faithful servant given counter-advise, and swayed it: persuading Abalom that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel to pursue his father, than by such a troop, which Davids valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Abalom, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeed, after God, the loss of the one, and delivery of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the success which followed, disposed of his own estate, and then forsook both the party and the care of Abalom, and of his own life.

David being advertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himself of Ahabanaim in the Tribe of Gad: the same wherein Ishobab himself in the war against David after Sauls death seated himself. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi the son of Nabash the Ammonite, whom David loved, the same which Josephus calleth Shiphar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most general and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hannu, whom David for his fathers sake established in the Kingdom, after Hannus overthrow: in thankfulness whereof he relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to Davids assistance Machir the Lodobar, Guardian in former times to Achishiboseth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his company.

In the mean time both the King and Abalom prepared to fight; Abalom made Amasa Commander of the Army of Israel, the same place which Joab held with David; an office next the King himself, like unto that of the Majors of the Palace anciently in France. David, persuaded by his company, stayed in Malanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abishai, and Itai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Malanaim, that they should spare the life of Abalom. But Joab, besides that he was very cruel by nature, remembered that Abalom had lately disposed of his government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and news brought him that Abalom hung by the hair of his head on a tree, when he could not persuade the messenger to return and kill him, he himself with his own servants dispatched him. It appeared also by the sequel that Joab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet living; and fearing the disposition of Abalom, he embraced the present advantage offered.

Hereof, together with news of the victory, when knowledge was brought to David, he mourned and sorrowed, not only as a man that had lost a son, but as one that had out-lived all his worldly joys, and seen every delight of life interred. For he so hid himself from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, covered themselves also in the City, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himself before David, persuaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himself to the Army. For first, he told him that he had discountenanced his faithful servants, who had that day preserved his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not only not to acknowledge so great a love and constancy in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary, grieve and lament at their good success. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Abalom at an easie rate. Secondly, he urged, that it was generally believed, that he loved his enemies, and hated his friends; and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithful servants, but would more have joyed if they had all perished, and Abalom lived, than in the victory by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, he used this prevalent argument, That if the King came not out and shewed himself publicly to his men of war, that they would all that very night abandon him, and return: concluding with this fearful threatening, And that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these over-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance uttered with a good intent) Joab raised David from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the City among the people, whom he assured of his love and affection, especially Amasi, who commanded the Army of Abalom, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship: the same which Abalom had given him, and which Joab now enjoyed. For David doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now under his commandment.

This

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reviled him to his face: but this remission was but external, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephoboseth his excuse, whom Ziba had fully acculed and betrayed.

He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberal host, to follow him to Jerusalem, that he might reward his service done him; who excusing himself by his age, appointed his son Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to have most interest in David, the Army brake, and David returned to Jerusalem. But Sheba the son of Bichri, a Benjaminite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontent among the Issachites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. David employed his reconciled Captain Amasa, to give him contentment, and to witness his trust, as also because he conceived that Amasa had interest in those revolts of Israel more than Joab had. He received commandment from David to assemble the Army within three days, which he forelived: but being onward on his way, Abibah, Joabs brother, was sent after him, with Davids guard and best Souldiers, whom also Joab accompanied: and overtaking Amasa near Gibeon, pretending to embrace him, gave him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no less jealous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, he pursued Sheba; and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the City with that fury, that the Citizens by the persuasions of a wife woman thence inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and flung it to Joab over the walls: which done, he retreated his Army to Jerusalem, and commanded, as before, all the Host of Israel.

The next act of David, was the delivery of Sauls sons or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom thote Citizens hung up in revenge of their fathers cruelty. David had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three years, came by reason of Saul and his house, and therefore he willingly yielded to give them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himself, as also, if we may judge humanely, to rid himself of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and indangered; only he spared Mephoboseth the son of Jonathan, both for the love he bare to his father, and for his oath and vow to God.

Now whereas it is written in the Text, The King took the two sons of Rishai, whom she bare unto Saul, and the five sons of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and delivered them to the Gibeonites: Junius calls this Michol the sister of her that was David: wife, she whom Saul married to Phaltiel: but Michol here named, had Adriel to her husband; the same which is named Merab in the first of Sammels the eighteenth, who was first promised to David when he slew Goliath in the Valley Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loved David, which perchance Merab did not, whether David had any humane respect in the delivery of her children, it is only known to God.

Now where the Geneva nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here used, having an eclipsis or defect, and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kindred, as in the 19. verse of the same one and twentieth chapter it is said of Goliath, whose spear was weighty as a Weavers beam, when as by the same eclipsis it must be understood by the brother of Goliath; Goliath himself being formerly slain.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of David, leaving no head unto rebellion: so did he strengthen both the King and Nation against foreign enemies by the valour of many brave Commanders, the like of whom, for number and quality, that people of Israel is not known to have had at any time before or after. Thirty Captains of thousands there were, all men of mark, and great reputation in war. Over these were six Colonells, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might be well held as miraculous. These Colonells had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to have been given upon meer consideration of their virtue. For Abishai the brother of Joab, who in the war against the Ammonites and Arameans was Lieutenant, and commanded half the army, could not attain to the honour of the first rank, but was fain to rest contented with being principal of the three Colonells of the second order, notwithstanding his nearness of blood unto the King, and his flourishing estate of his own house, and his well approved services.

All

All these Colonels and Captains, with the Companies belonging to them, may seem to have been such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readiness for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mulctured and drawn out, if need required, into the field, very far exceeded thirty thousand, yea, or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Saul's time, and been hardened with his adventures. Others there were very many, and principal men in their several Tribes, that repaired unto him after the death of Saul; but these Captains and Colonels (who with Joab, that was General of all the Kings Forces, make up the number of 37.) were the special men of War, and reckoned as David's Worthies. The long reign of David, as it is known to have consumed many of these excellent men of War, so may it probably be guessed to have waited the most of those whose deaths we find no where mentioned. For the sons of Zeruya, who had been too hard for David, were worn away, and only Joab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abihai to stand by his side in his last extremity.

By the actions forepassed in the time of David, it is gathered, that he had reigned now 33. years or thereabouts, when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enjoyed about eleven years of entire quiet and security, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the succession of Salomon in his Fathers Throne. In this time also David having established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he again displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Joab, with other Captains of his Army, who after nine months and twenty days travel, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to bear Arms, and they amounted to the number of thirteen hundred thousand, besides Levi and Benjamin, whereof in Juda and the Cities thereof, five hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himself to which he pleased; to wit, seven years Famine; three months War, wherein he should be unprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a general pestilence to last three days: David made choice to bow himself under the hand of God only, and left himself subject to that cruel disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70. thousand. And hereby he hath taught all that live, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giveth this divine reason, For his mercies are great.

2 Sam. 14.

§. VIII.

Of the last acts of David; Adonijah's faction; the revenge upon Joab and Shimei.

Lastly, when he grew weak and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of Women, he was yet advised to lie in the arms of a young and well-complexioned Maiden, to keep him warm. In this his weak estate of body, when he was in a manner bed-ridden, Adonijah his eldest son (Ammon and Abshalom being now dead) having drawn unto his party that invincible, renowned and feared Joab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdom after his Father. For being the eldest now living of David's sons, and a man of goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and born of a Mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by Saint Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carry the matter without resistance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Berisabe the Mother of Salomon, who did put him in mind of his faithful promise, that Salomon, her son should reign after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing unto the King, and seconding her report of Adonijah his presumption) the King calling unto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benajah the Captain of his Guard, gave charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himself used to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinary and choice men of War, the Cherubites, and Polechites, shewed himself to the people. These tidings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life, he held by the horns of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, David had remaining two especial cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts, the one concerning the peace of the Land, which might be disturbed by some Rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all means to advance, and make the business publick. To bring these intentions to good effect, he summoned a Parliament,

Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the several Tribes, the Captains and Officers, with all the mighty, and men of power; who did repair unto Jerusalem.

In this Assembly the King stood up, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his own title to the Crown, shewing that the Kingdom was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Jacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himself was pleased to make choice of him among all his Fathers sons. In like manner he said that God himself had appointed Salomon by name to be his Successour; whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his son to conform themselves unto all that God had commanded, and particularly to go forward in this Work of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the pattern of the Work, according to the form which God himself had appointed; and so laying open his own preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The Kings proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that whereas he himself had given three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand of silver, they added unto it seven thousand of gold, and ten thousand of silver, besides brass, iron, and Jewels, heartily rejoicing in the advancement of so religious a Work. This business being so well dispatched, a solemn Feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was again anointed King, and received fealty of all the Princes and people of the Land, and of all the Princes his brethren, the sons of King David. Salomon being thus established King, his Father David finding himself even in the hands of death, first exhorted his son to exercise the same courage and strength of mind, which himself had done in all his attempts: and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprises, he uttered these mighty words; Take heed to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which GOD fastned the succession, and prosperity of his issues. For this done (saith GOD himself) Thou shalt not want one of thy Posterity to sit upon the Throne of Israel.

Secondly, he advised him concerning Joab; who out of doubt had served David from the first assault of Jerusalem to the last of his Wars, with incomparable valour and fidelity, saying that he fastened himself to Adonijah (his master yet living) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath never left cruelty unrevenge, so was it his will that Joab should drink of the same cup, whereof he hath enforced other men to taste, and suffer the same violence which himself had unjustly strooken others withal, Qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaved Abner and Amasa of their lives, having against the one the pretence only of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slain in the time of War, and could not avoid him: against the other but a meer jealousy of his growing great in the favour of David. And though Joab assured himself that Abner and Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equal him, or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised up Benajah the son of Jehojadab, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in peeces. For David giveth this cause to Salomon against Joab, that he slew the Captains of the Host of Israel, and shed blood of battle in peace; and to this apparent and just cause, it is not improbable but that David remembered the ill affection of Joab towards Salomon, which Joab made manifest by the untimely setting up of Adonijah, David yet living. Some other offence Joab had committed against David, of which in these words he put his son Salomon in mind; Thou knowest also what Joab the son of Seriah did to me, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abshalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words used to him when he mourned in Mahanaim for Abshalom; or whether it were the publishing of David's letter, unto him for the killing of Uriah, thereby to disgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that those great men of War do oftentimes behave themselves exceeding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their service done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their masters cannot misliss them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kind of pride hath overthrow many a worthy man otherwise deserving great honour and respect.

He also gave order to Salomon to rid himself of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at David, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise David spared Shimei all the time himself lived, yet being dull and in the grave, he slew him by the hand of Salomon his son. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seventh

venth of England had his pattern, when he gave order to Henry the Eighth to execute Pool as soon as himself was buried, having made promise to the King of Spain, when he delivered Pool unto him, that while he lived he would never put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid upon him.

And yet did not the execution of Joab yeeld unto Salomon any such great profit or assurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumea, and Resin of Damascus to vex him: who, as the Scriptures witness, were emboldened to enterprize upon Salomon, hearing that David slept with his Fathers, and that Joab the Captain of the Host was dead. Now when David had reigned in all forty years, to wit, in Hebron 7. years, and in Jerusalem three and thirty, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts and graces, he so far exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailty apart, he was said by God himself to be a man according to his own heart. The Palms which he wrote, witness his piety, and his excellent learning: of whom Hierome to Paulinus: David Simonides nofter, Pindarus, & Alcaeus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Christum lyra perfonat, & in de chachordo Plalterio ad inferis fufcit refurgentem; David (saith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcaeus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, he playeth Christ on his Harp, and on a ten-stringed Plalter he raifeth him up rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Christ more lightfomly and lively than all the rest.

The book of the Palms, saith Glycas, was divided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Palms were written by David, it is diversly disputed. For Athanasius, Cyprian, Iyranus, and others conceive divers Authors answering the titles of the several Palms, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named; and that only 73. Palms were composed by David himself, namely, those which are intituled ipsius David. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are bestowed upon Asaph the son of Barachia, eleven other on the sons of Korah; and eleven are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the ten following, and so they are intituled in the old Hebrew Copies, though the Vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Palms which David wrote not, Sixtus Senensis nameth as followeth; Salomon, Moses, (whom Aben Ezra contrary to Hierome, maketh one of David's fingers) Asaph, Ethan-Eziachi, Eman-Esaiara, Vidit idit idit, and the three sons of Chore. But S. Chrysostome makes David the sole Author of all the Palms, and so doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner: Although (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Palms only to David, which are over-written ipsius David, and the rest intituled ipsi David, to others, this opinion (saith he) Voce Evangelica Saluatoris ipsius refutatur, ubi ait quod ipse David in spiritu Christum dixerit offe sum Domini, quoniam Psalmus 109. sic incipit, Dixit Domini Domino meo, Sede ad dextris meis, &c. The voice of the Gospel refutes this opinion, where it saith, that David himself in the spirit called Christ his Lord; because the 109. Palm begins thus: The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his Testimonies are used both by Christ and the Apostles, and he was as a pattern to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

His Story, and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. vers. 19. For the several parts of the books of Samuel which treat chiefly of David, were, as it seems, written by these three holy men.

Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Trojans during the time of the siege fought for succour from David, and that he stayed Neuter in that War. But it seemeth that Manasses did miscast the time 'twixt David and the Trojan War. For it is generally received that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Sampson Judges of Israel, about the Worlds year 2848. and David died in the year 2991.

Of the treasures of David and Salomon.

His treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver, and of brals and iron passing all weight, which was more than any King in the World posselt besides himself, and his son, to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty and three cart-load, and a third of a cart-load of silver, allowing two thousand weight of silver, or six thousand pound sterling to every cart-load, besides threescore and seventeen millions of French Crowns, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound:

a matter, but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all belief. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appear, seeing that the Judges had not any treasure, nor any sovereign power to make levies; but when they went to the wars they were followed by such volunteers as the several tribes by turns gave them: seeing also that Saul who was of a mean parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philistines, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part posselt by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amiss to consider how David within the space of not very many years, might amass up such mighty treasures. For though parimony be it self a great revenue, yet needs there must have been some other great means. It seems that he made the uttermost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Engelsius in his 9. book and last chapter de Preparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that David, among other preparations for the Temple, built a Navy in Melania (Coras) Villapandus corrects it, Achanis a city of Arabia, and from thence sent men to dig for gold in the land Ophe, which Ortelius thinks was Ophir, though Eupolemus in this place of Engelsius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this land was in the red Sea: from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Jury, Pineda l. 2. de Rebus Salomonis, c. 1. thinks that David did this way also enrich himself, and citeth this testimony of Eupolemus: and yet certainly David had many other ways to gather riches. Much land doubtless he gained by conquest from the Canaanites and Philistines, besides those fruitful vallies near Jordan in Trachonitis and Bajan, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the Israhelites. These domains belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captives, which he took in his wars, which were not able to redeem themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written 1 Chro. 17. that Jehonathan was over his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the cities, in the towns; that Ezri was over the labourers that tilled his ground, Simci over the vineyards, and Sabdi over the store of thine; Baal Hanan over the olive trees, and Joash over the store of the oyle: also that he had herdsmen that had charge over his cattle, both in the high lands and in the plains, over his Sheep, Camels and Asses. And this custom of enriching themselves by husbandry and cattle, the ancient Kings every where held, both before and after David's time. For we read of Pharaoh, that he spake to Joseph Gen. 47. to appoint some of his brethren, or of their servants, to be rulers over his cattle. We read of Ozzia, that he loved husbandry, had much cattle, and plough-men, and driers of Vines: likewise we read it in all Greek Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did specially consist in their Herds and Flocks; whereof it were needless to cite Angust and Admetus, or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David it is not unlikely, but that those captives which were not employed in husbandry, were many of them used by him in all sorts of gainful professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner used their slaves.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions, which doubtless were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tobu and others) we may add the great spoils which hee found in the Cities and Countries which he conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem captivitatis; By the law of captivation, or head money, every man rich or poor paying half a sicle of the Sanctuary, which is about as much as fourteen pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous sum in that Kingdom: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seventy thousand fighting men were numbred by Joab. Now although this law of captivation be thought by some very learned, not to have been perpetual (which opinion of theirs nevertheless they confels is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David upon this occasion is not unlikely to have put it in practise. And by these means might hee be able to leave those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seem that of this great mass of gold and silver left by David, the least part was his own in private; and so will it appear the less wonderfull that he left so much. Of his own liberality we find, that hee gave to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand talents of silver: a great sum, but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuary it self were exceeding great, as needs they must have been having received continual encrease, without any loss or diminution ever since the time of Moses and Josuah. The revenues of the Sanctuary (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defrayed the dayly expences, & maintained the Priests & Levites)

Num. 31. 27. were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoils gotten in War. For all the booty was divided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other half; whereby all the Country received benefit of the Victory, yet so, that the Souldiers had a far greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every single share.

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fifty, of that which the people received, and one in five hundred, of that which was given to the Souldiers; namely, one hundred and one thousand part of the whole booty. So in the spoil of Midian, thirty two thousand Women being taken, the Army had sixteen thousand of them for slaves, and the Congregation had other sixteen thousand; but out of the sixteen thousand given to the Army, were exempted two and thirty for the Lords tribute; Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this means, the lessor that the Army was which had exposed it self to danger, the greater profit had every Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were fain to undergo more than ordinary travel in domestical affairs, did receive by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was always certain, yea many times it was increased, either by some special commandment, as when all the gold, and silver, and other mettals found in Jerico, were consecrated unto God; or by thankfulness of the Rulers and people, as when after the Victory obtained against the Midianites without the loss of one man, all Jewels, Bracelets, Earrings, and the like, were offered up, as voluntary presents.

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppressed, and trodden down by other Nations, yet were not they, treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies never got possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuary must have been exceeding great; as containing above one hundredth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many Victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. For that this treasury was not defrauded of the due portion, it is evident, seeing that before the time of David and his Lieutenant Joab, it is recorded that Saul and Alner, and before them Samuel, had used to dedicate of the spoils obtained in War, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Judges and Captains of other Ages. Certain it is, that the Conquest of David brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former Victories had purchased, those of Joshua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of silver, may seem rather to have been made up, by the addition of his winnings and liberality, to the treasures laid up in many former Ages, than to have been the meer fruits of his own industry.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he received of yearly revenues with his tributes 666 Talents of gold, besides the Customs of Spices. He had also fix rich Returns from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that Voyage every three years, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth year of his reign, and ruled forty years. Besides this, all Judea and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobab, of Damascus, of Palmyrena, of Turea; all of Idumea, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tributes; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Hivites, Yebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished though subjected.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdom of Israel reduced by David, who after 40 years reign, and 70 years of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the City of David. It is written by Josephus that there was hid in David's Tomb a marvellous quantity of treasures, inasmuch as Hyrcaeus (who first of the Chasmanaei, or race of Maccabees, called himself King) one thousand and three hundred years after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himself of Antiochus then besieging Jerusalem; and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding mass of gold and silver therein. And it was an ancient custome to bury treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they enriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did bury so much treasure in his Fathers grave, it would hardly be believed, in regard of the great exactions with which he was fain to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches, which he got otherwise, or which were left unto him: were it notwith considered that his want of

of money grew from such magnificent imployments. Particularly of the Sepulchre of David the Scriptures have no mention, but only the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of burial. Yet the Monuments of these Kings, as (by relation of the Duke of Ulica) they remained within these thirty years, and are like to remain still, are able to make report credible of the cost bestowed upon them.

Of the Philistims, whom David absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaries with David.

OF the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of David's time somewhat here may be spoken.

They defended of Casloim, who, according to Isidor and Josephus, was one of the sons of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Ejan was surnamed Edom, and Jacob Israel. There were of them five Cities or petty Principalities, namely, Azotus or Ajdod, Gaza or Aczaph, Afalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Casloim was the first founder of this Nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that Abimelech which loved Sara, Abraham's Wife.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of Famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar, in the border of Idumea; which Abimelech fascinated Isaac his Wife, as his Father had done Sara.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembered in the Scriptures, till David's time: perhaps the government was turned into Aristocratical. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howsoever Achis be named King of Gath, the fame to whom David fled, and who again gave him Siklag to inhabit in Saul's time.

After him we read of another Achis who lived with Salomon, to whom Shimei travelled to fetch back his fugitive servant, what time the seeking of his servant was the loss of his life. Jeremy the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palestine or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Afalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the Wars of the Philistims are remembered in the Catalogue of the Judges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not need to collect the particulars in this place:

There lived at once with David, the third of the Silvii King of Alba, called Latinus Silvius, who is said to have ruled that part of Italy fifty years. And about his fourteenth year Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontide, without real name governed Athen during their life.

The reasons which moved the Athenians to change their government, were not drawn from any inconvenience found in the rule of sovereignty, but in honour of Codrus only. For when the Grecians of Doris, a region between Phocis, and the mountain of Oeta, fought counsel from the Oracle, for their success in the Wars against the Athenians, it was answered, that then undoubtedly they should prevail and become Lords of that State, when they could obtain any Victory against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King living. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrew himself from his own Forces, and putting on the habit of a common souldier, entered the Camp of the Dorians, and killing the first he encountered, was himself forthwith cut in pieces.

Empales the 31. King of Affyria, which others account but the 30. began to rule that Empire, about the 13. year of David, and held it 38. years.

Near the same time began Ixion the second King of the Heraclidae, the son of Enrighenes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heraclidae in Lacedaemon: in honour of which Agis, his successours were called Agide, for many years after. He restored the Laconians to their former liberty: he overcame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: he condemned them and theirs to perpetual slavery: whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helots.

In like sort from the Sclavii came the Word Slave. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized upon the Country of Illyria, and made it their own by conquest, their victory pleased them so highly, that thereupon they called themselves by a new name, Slavos, which is in their language Glorious. But in after times (that warmer Climate having thawed their Northern hardiness, and not ripened their Wits) when they were trodden down, and made servants with their neighbours, the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen Slaves, using the word as a name of reproach: in which sense it is now current through many Countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later about the 23. year of David, and say that Acheffratus was the fourth King of this race, the same whom Eusebius calls Labotes, and sets him in the 13. year of Salomon.

In the tenth year of Acheffratus, Androclus the third son of Codrus, assisted by the Ionians, built Ephefus in Caria, who after the adjoining of the Ille of Samos to his Territory, was slain by the Carians, whose Country he usurped. He was buried (saith Pausanias) in one of the gates of Ephefus called Magnetes, his armed Statua being set over him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next Province to Ephefus on the seacoast of Asia the less) he enlarged his Dominions upon the Aeoles, which joyneth to Ionian: and that his posterity governed the Cities of Ephefus and Erythrae by the name of Basilide in Strabo his own time. Of the expedition of the Ionians how they came hither out of Peloponnesus, I have spoken already upon occasion of the return of the Heraclide into Peloponnesus, wherein, with the Dores, they expelled the Achei, and inhabited their places in that Land: though this of the Ionians succeeded that of the Heraclide 100. years.

The City of Ephefus became exceeding famous: first, for the Temple of Diana therein built, which had in length 425. foot, and 220. in breadth, sustained with 127. pillars of marble, of 70. foot high: whereof 27. were most curiously graven, and all the rest of choice marble polish, the work being first set out by Ctesiphon of Gnosfos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that received the Christian faith, of which Timothy was Bishop; to whom, and to the Ephefians, Saint Paul wrote his Epistle fo entitled. The other City posselt by Androclus in Eolus, was also universally spoken of by reason of Sy-billa, furnished Erythraea, who lived 740. years before Christ was born. S. Augustine avoweth that a Roman Proconsul shewed him in an ancient Greek copy certain verses of this Prophetes, which began (as S. Augustine changed them into Latin) in these words: Iesus Christus Dei Filius, Salvator; Iesus Christ Son of God, the Saviour.

About the time that Joab besieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres began to govern in Egypt, the same that was father in law to Salomon whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembred by Eusebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of David, was the City of Magna in Asia the less founded, the same which is seated upon the river Meander, where Scipio gave the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this Territory are the best horses of the lesser Asia bred, whereof Lucan:

Et Magnetis equis, Minye gens cognita remis.

About the same time Cuma in Campania was built by the Inhabitants of Chalcis in Eubaea, according to Servius, with whom Strabo joyneth the Cumeans of Eolis, saying, that to the one of these people the government was given, with condition that the other should give name to the City. Of this Cuma was Ephores the famous scholar of Socrates.

Eusebius and Cassiodor find the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. year of David, but much mistaken. For the father of Dido was Metinos the son of Eadegor, brother to Jezabel, who married Achab King of Israel; and between the death of David, and the first of Achab, there were wasted about 45. years.

In this time also Aeacus lived, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteen in descent before the State changed into a Magistracy of ten years. Some writers make it probable, that the Aeolians, led by Graus, the grand nephew of Oristes, posselt the City and Island of Thebes about this time. In the 32. year of David, Hiram began to reign in Tyre, according to Josephus, who saith in his twelfth year Salomon began the work of the Temple. But it is a familiar error in Josephus, to misreckon times, which in this point he doth so strangely, as if he knew not how at all to to cast any account. For it is manifest, that Hiram sent Messengers, and Cedars unto David, soon after his taking of Jerusalem, which was in the beginning of David's reign over Israel, when as yet he had reigned onely seven years in Hebron over the house of Juda. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had reigned above 30. years before Salomon; unless more credit should be given to those Tyrian records which are cited by Josephus, than to the plain words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram which lived both with David and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest.

of SOLOMON.

S. I.

Of the establishing of Salomon: of birth-right, and the cause of Adonijah's death, and of Salomon's wisdom.

SALOMON, who was brought up under the Prophet Nathan, began to reign over Juda and Israel, in the year of the world 2991. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: he was also called Jediddia, or Theophilus by Nathan, because the Lord loved him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomon's anointing, dispatched Embassadors towards him, congratulating his establishment: a custom between Princes very ancient. Whence we read that David did in like sort salute Hiram.

1 Sam. 10.

Hiram King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdom. The beginning of Salomon was in blood, though his reign were peaceable. For soon after David's death, he caused his Brother Adonijah to be slain by Benaiah the son of Jehojada, taking occasion from Adonijah's desire by Bertheba, that the young maid Abisag (which lay in David's bosom in his later daies, to keep him warm) might be given to him. Whatsoever he pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and sought the Kingdom contrary to the will of David, whom God inclined towards Salomon. And yet it is said that a word is enough to the wife, and he that fees but the claw may know whether it be a Lion or no: so it may seem that to the quick-sighted wisdom of Salomon, this motion of Adonijah's, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had been Concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by a King: whence Achitophel wished Abolom to take his fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And David after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but shut them up, and they remained widowed until their death. And this it seems was the depth of Isobeth's quarrel against Abner, for having his fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custom may seem too in the words of God by Nathan to David; I have given thee thy Masters house, and thy Masters wives. And in the words of Saul upbraiding Jonathan, that he had chosen David to the shame of the nakedness of his Mother. Hereupon perhaps was some reference to this purpose of Adonijah, to marry with her that was always present with David in his later daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conveying of the Kingdom to Salomon. There may be divers further occasions; as either that he would learn such things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would perfwade her to forge some strange tale about David's last Testament, or any thing else that might prejudice the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, and with the customs of the Jews: yet the Kings of the Jews were so absolute, as they did therein, & in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to use this paternal authority in transferring the birth-right to a younger son: namely, of Jacobs disheriting Reuben, and giving the birth-right (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Joseph: of whom he made two Tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in David, it appeareth by the words of Bertheba and Nathan to David, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For, as for popular election, that it was necessary to confirm, or that the refusal of the people had authority to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdom, it no where appears in the stories of the Jews. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Calgal: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before, no man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of choosing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that he put Adonijah to death, he rid himself also of Joab, and three years after of Shimei, as David had advised him: he displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who took part with Adonijah against him: but but in respect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and because he had born the Ark of God before his Father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdom, he took the daughter of Pharaoh King of Egypt to Wife: for so Eusebius out of Epiphanius calls him. He offered a thousand sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing unto him in a dream, bad him ask what he would at his hands: Salomon chooseth Wisdom, which pleased God. And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thyself long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thyself, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I have done according to thy words: by which we may inform our selves, what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coveting after long life in respect of our selves, cannot but proceed of self-love, which is the root of all impiety: the desire of private riches is an affection of covetousness, which God abhorreth; to affect revenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his justice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David, or from the Law of God; but because Salomon desired Wisdom onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to give him vrrthall that vvhich he desired not. And I have also given thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of Wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost all kinds of learning; but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and living creatures, the Scripture testifieth; though no doubt the chief excellency of Salomon's wisdom, vvas in the knowledge of governing his Kingdom: vvhence, as it vvere for an example of his vvhidom, the Scripture telleth how soon he judg'd the controversie between the two harlots.

§. II.

Of Salomon's building and glory.

HE then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom he had much of his materials for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father David, and another from God. For like as it is written of David, that He called Salomon his son, and charged him to build a house for the Lord of Israel: so doth Tostatus give the force of a divine precept to these words, Rebeld, a son is born unto thee, &c. He shall build an house for my Name.

He began the work of the Temple in the beginning of the fourth year of his reign, at which time also he prepared his fleet at Esson-gabar to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a work. For, that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were passing to and fro, it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaggin trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building of all the particulars (whereof the form and example was given by God himself) many learned men have written; as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Baradas, Acorius, Villalpandus, Pineda, & others, to whom I refer the Reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that building, Salomon employed 30. thousand Carpenters, 10. thousand every month by course: he also used 80. thousand Masons in the Mountain, and 70. thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceived, he selected out of the Profelices, besides three thousand three hundred masters of his work; so as he paid and employed in all, one hundred eighty three thousand and three hundred men; in which number the Sidonians, which were far more skillful in hewing timber than the Israelites, may (as I think) be included. For Hiram caused his servants to bring down the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the sea, and thence sent them in rassa to Joppa, or the next port to Jerusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plain, that all but the thirty thousand Carpenters, and the over-seers, were strangers, and as it seemeth the vassals of Hiram, and of Pharaoh King of Egypt. In recompence of this Timber and Stone, Salomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of Wheat, & twenty measures of pure Oyl yearly. Eusebius out of Epiphanius in the ninth book of his preparation, the last Chapter, hath left us a Copy of Salomon's Letter to Suron (which was the same as Haram and Hiram) King of Tyre, in these words:

REX Salomon Saroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœnicie regi, Amico paterno salutem. Scias me à Deo magno David patris mei regnum accepisse, cumque mihi pater precepit templum Deo, qui terram creavit, condere, et etiam ad te scribere precepit: Scribo igitur, & peto à te ut artifices atque fabros ad edificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

King

King Salomon to King Suron, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phœnicia King, and my fathers friend, sendeth greeting. Thou may understand that I have received of the great God of my father David, the Kingdom: and when my father commanded me to build a Temple to God which created heaven and earth, he commanded also that I should write to you: I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send me Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this answer.

Suron, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phœnicie Rex, Salomon Regi salutem. Læti literis, gratias ego Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros, ministrumque ad condendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, misi ad te milia hominum octingenta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Judæa, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabit igitur ut necessarii ne egeant, & Templo Dei condito, ad nos redeant.

Suron of Tyre, Sydon and Phœnicia King, to King Salomon greeting: When I read your Letters, I gave God thanks who hath installed you in your fathers kingdom. And because you write that Carpenters and Workmen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I have sent you fourscore thousand men, and a Master-builder, a Tyrian, born of a Jewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be careful that all necessities be provided for them; and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to us.

The Copies of these Letters were extant in Josephus's time, as himself affirmeth, and to be seen (saith he) Tam in nostris quam in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our own, as in the Tyrian annals. But he delivereth them somewhat in different terms, as the Reader may find in his Antiquities: But were this intercourse between Salomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise delivered in the Scriptures, than either Epiphanius or Josephus set it down, but so, that in substance there is little difference between the one and the other.

The like Letter in effect Salomon is said to have written to Pharaoh King of Egypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commenters upon Salomon, find that Hiram King of Tyre, and Pharaoh King of Egypt, gave Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Epiphanius in evidence, I do not find any such addition of magnus in Eusebius, in the last chapter of that ninth book; neither is it in Josephus in the eighth book and second chapter of the Jews Antiquities: it being a vain title used by some of the Affrian and Persian Kings, and used likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, in so much as in later times it grew common, and was usurped by mean persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightiness.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Jerusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had been the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Joshua's time: so did he Gaza of the Philistines: he built Serathon, Gerar, and the Mislo or munition of Jerusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in favour of Salomon) came up into the edge of Ephraim, and took Gerar, which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their City. The place and Territory he gave Salomon's Wife for a dowry. And it is probable, that because Salomon was then busied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the war, that he entreated his father in law to rid him of these neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But he thereby taught the Egyptians to visit those parts again before they were sent for; and in his son Reheboams time Shebek this mans successor did sack Jerusalem it self.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Jordan, and Belah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thadmor in the desert of Juda, or (as Josephus thinks) Palmira in the desert of Syria; which Palmira, because it stood on the utmost border of Salomon's dominion to the Northeast of Libani, and was of David's conquest when he van Damascus, it may seem that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Josephus calls this place Thadmor, by which name (saith he) given by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his book of Hebrew places, calls it Thermech. In after-times, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building, Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twenty talents of gold received from Hiram's servants; Salomon offered Hiram twenty towns in or near the upper Galilee, but because they stood in an unfruitful and marshy ground, Hiram refused them, and therefore was the territory called Chabul.

These towns, as it is supposed, lay in Gallie of the Gentiles, Non quod Gentis ibi habitarent: sed quia sub dititione regis Gentilis erat, Not that it was possess'd by the Gentiles (saith Naucleus) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoever it were, it is true that Salomon in the 21. year fortified those places which Hiram refused. Further, he made a journey into Syria Zobab, and established his tributaries; the first and last war (in that expedition he were driven to fight) that he made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his Dominions, passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Defarts of Idumea, from whence he visited Eziongeber and Eloth the uttermost place of the South of all his Territories, bordering to the Red sea: which Cities I have described in the Story of Moses.

§. III.

Of Salomons sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Salomons riches, and of Pineda's conceit of two strange passages about Africk.

Here Salomon prepared his Fleet of ships for India, with whom Hiram joynd in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert seamen. From this part of Arabia which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by David, did the Fleet pass to the East-India, which was not far off, namely, to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witness the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, do yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manilla, and recover a great quantity from thence, and with less labour than they do in any one part of Peru, or new Spain.

The return which was made by these Ships amounted to four hundred and twenty talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eighth, it is written 450. talents: whereof 30. talents went in expence for the charge of the Fleet, and wages of men; and 420. talents, which makes five and twenty hundred and twenty thousand Crowns, came clear. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1 Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of six hundred sixty and six talents of gold; that sum, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomon, which were yearly, and which came to him, besides those profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought) ^{c. 8. f. 8. 3.} but a Countrey in the East-Indies, ^{with 10. 12.} some reason why at those times they could not make more speedy return to Jerusalem from the East-Indies, ^{Lib. 4. de rebus Saba- mien. c. 6.} than in three years; ^{cap. 15.} and that Tharfis in Scripture is divers times taken for the Ocean, hath been already declared in the first book.

Only it remaineth that I should speak somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Baetica, would fain have Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tartessus, which is the Southwest corner of that Province, to be the Tharfis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seems, but for love of his own Countrey, and because of some affinity of sound between Tharfis and Tartessus. For whereas it may seem strange that it should be three years ere they that took ship in the Red sea, should return from the East-Indies to Jerusalem, this hath been in part answered already. And further the intelligent may conceive of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metal, and in their other traffick, and in their land-carriages between Jerusalem and the Red sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: so that we have no need to make Salomons men to go many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africk, that so they might be long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them could not have been ignorant of) was along the Mediterranean sea, and so (besides many wonderful inconveniences, and terrible navigation in rounding Africa) they should have escaped the troublesome land-carriage between Jerusalem and the Red sea, through dry, desert, and the thiefish Countreys: or within 30. miles of Jerusalem at Joppe, or some other haven in Salomons own Countrey, have laden and unladen their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis, in largeness greater than all Africk and Asia, being swallowed up in the Atlantic Ocean, hindred Salomons ships from passing through the straits of Gibraltar: for this he alledgeth Plato in Timaeo. But that this calamity happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the straits of Gades were filled with mud, and made unpassable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Mediterranean sea; or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scoureth his channel, should be filled filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to have stood; or that Salomons ships being in the Red sea, should neglect the golden Mines in the East Indies (which were infinitely better and nearer to the Red sea, than any in Spain) to seek gold at Cadyz, by the way of compassing Africa; it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himself that hath also the rich Peru in the West, fortifieth in the East-Indies, and inhabits some part thereof, as in Manilla, finding in those parts no less quantity of gold (the small territory which he there possieth considered) than in Peru.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elsewhere he dreams of: supposing whereas Jonas failing to Tharfis the City of Cilicia, was cast out in the Mediterranean sea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this Whale in three dayes swimming above twelve thousand English miles along the Mediterranean seas, and to through the Straights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africa, cast up Jonas upon the shore of the Red sea, that so he might have perhaps some six miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Ninive. This conceit he grounds only upon the ambiguity of the word Soph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the Red sea (as if we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the Red sea. But in Jonas c. 2. §. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would have it, who in this place against his own rule (which elsewhere he giveth us) supposeth strange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale, finished in three dayes, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of Jonas in the belly of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessity of this miracle, we fend it back unto him, keeping his own rule, which in this place he forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And again, Non sunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio nova fingenda. Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessity, nor delivered without cause, nor feigned at pleasure. Therefore we leave this man in his dreams, which (were he not otherwise very learned and judicious) might be thought unworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our story of Salomon.

The Queen of Saba's coming from far to Salomon (as seems, from Arabia Felix, and not, as some think, from Ethiopia) and her rich presents, and Salomons reciprocal magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions; those are set down at large in the Text. But herein Josephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queen of Saba Nicanor, the successor (saith he out of Herodotus) of those thirty and eight Egyptian Kings which succeeded Menens the Founder of Alempsis; adding, that after this Egyptian, and the father in law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elsewhere proved that the Queen was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; so were there other Pharaohs after the father in law of Salomon. Yea, above three hundred years after Salomon, Pharaoh Necho slew Josias King of Juda.

It is also written of Salomon, that he kept in garisons fourteen thousand Chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen; that he spent in Court every day thirty measures of fine flower, threecore measures of wheat, one hundred sheep, besides stags and fallow Deer, bugles and fowl; four thousand stalls of horses he had for his Chariots and other uses, and for the twelve thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stalls in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but four thousand stalls or teams, and in every team ten horses, as Junius and the Geneva understand it. He was said to be wiser than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrabite, as Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda; to which Junius addeth a fift, to wit, Ezra, Ezra, Ezra, For the Geneva maketh Ethan an Ezrabite by Nation. Josephus writes them, Athan, Ezra, Ezra, Chalcal, and Donan the sons of Hemon. He spake three thousand Proverbs, and his Songs were one thousand and five, whereof either the most part perished in the Captivity of Babylon, or else because many acts of Salomons were written and kept among the publick Records of Civil causes, and not Ecclesiastical, therefore they were not thought necessary to be inserted into Gods Book.

§. IV.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he lived.

Now as he had plenty of all other things, so had he no scarcity of women. For besides his seven hundred Wives, he kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people should accompany the daughters of Idolaters) he took Wives out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when he fell a doting, his Wives turned his heart after other gods, as Asertab D d d 2 of

of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumea, Rezin of Damascus, and by Jeroboam his own servant, and one of the masters of his works, who by the ordinance of God tare from his son Roboam, ten of the twelve parts of all the territory he had. Deus dum in peccatores animadvertit, aliorum peccatis nititur, quæ ipse non fecit: God punishing sinners, with the sins of others, which he himself wrought not.

In the reign of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other works of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Forty years he reigned; how many he lived, it is not written, and must therefore be found only by conjecture. The most likely way to guess at the truth in this case is, by considering the actions of David before and after Salomon's birth, whereby we may best make estimation of the years which they consumed, and consequently learn the true, or most likely year of his nativity. Seven years David reigned in Hebron: in his eighth year he took Jerusalem, and warred with the Philistines, who also troubled him in the year following. The bringing home of the Ark seems to have been in the tenth year of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the year ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leisure, living in rest. After this he had wars with the Philistines, Moabites, Aramites, and Edomites, which must needs have held him five years, considering the Aramites of Damascus raised war against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadazer; and that in every of these wars, he had the entire victory. Neither is it likely, that these services occupied any longer time, because in those dayes and places there were no wintering camps in use, but at convenient seasons of the year Kings went forth to war, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their Armies, partly upon the spoil of the enemies country, partly upon the private provision which every souldier made for himself. The

17. year of David, in which he took Achish the son of Jonathan into his Court, appeareth to have passed away in quiet; and the year following to have begun the war with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to trial of a battel (for Joab after the victory, returned immediately to Jerusalem) the causes and preparations for that war, taking up all the Summer. David's personal expedition against the Aramites, wherein he brought all the tributaries of Hadadazer under his own allegiance, appears manifestly to have been the next years work, wherein he did cut off all means of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab, and Idumea being now at his own devotion. By this reckoning it must have been the 20. year of David's reign, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he sent forth Joab to besiege Rabba, and finish the war of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Oriah's wife. So one half of David's reign was very prosperous: in the other half he felt great sorrow, by the execution, execution, and sad remembrance of that heavy judgment laid upon him by God for his foul and bloody offence.

Now very manifest it is, that in the year after the death of that child which was begotten in adultery, Salomon was born, who must needs therefore have been nineteen years old or thereabout when he began to reign at the decease of his father, as being begotten in the 21. year of his fathers reign, who reigned in all forty.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of David, as may be collected out of ensuing Actions: for two years passed ere Abshalom slew his brother Amnon; three years ere his father pardoned him, and two years more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seems to have been one years work. So the rebellion it self, with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa, and the rest, may well seem to have been in the 30. year of David's reign.

Whether the three years of famine should be reckoned apart from the last years of war with the Philistines, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needful to conjecture. Plain enough it is, that in the ten remaining years of David there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for the three years of famine, for four years of war, and for numbring the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his own last infirmity, and disposing of the Kingdom. Yet indeed it seems that the war with the Philistines was but one years work, and ended in three or four fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob near unto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This war the Philistines undertook, as it seemeth, upon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by David's old age: for he fainted now in the battel, and was afterwards hindered by his men from exposing himself himself unto danger any more. So David had six or seven years of rest, in which time it is likely that many of his great men of War dyed (being of his own age) whereby the stirring spirit of Adonijah found little succour in the broken party of Joab the son of Zeruia.

At this time it might both truly be said by David to Salomon, Thou art a wise man; and by Salomon to God, I am but a young child; for nineteen years of age might well agree with either of these two speeches.

Nevertheless there are some that gather out of Salomon's professing himself a child, that he was but eleven years old when he began to reign. Of these Rabbi Salomon seems the first Author, whom other of great learning and judgment have herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps upon that which is said of Abshalom's rebellion, that it was after forty years, which they understood as years of David's reign. But whereas Reboam the son of Salomon was 41. years old when he began to reign, it would follow hereby that his father had begotten him, being himself but a child of nine or ten years old; the difference between their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who reigned 40. years) were but eleven years old when his reign began. To avoid this inconvenience, Josephus allows 80. years of reign to Salomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeed have in favour of this opinion, construed the words of Josephus, as if they included all the years of Salomon's life. But by such reckoning he should have been 40. years old at his Fathers death; and consequently should have been born long before his Father had won Jerusalem; which is a manifest untruth. Wherefore the 40. years remembered in Abshalom's rebellion, may either seem to have reference to the space between David's first anointment, and the trouble which God brought upon him for his wickedness, or perhaps be read (according to Josephus, Theodoret, and the Latine translation) four years; which passed between the return of Abshalom to Jerusalem, and his breaking out.

Of Salomon's Writings.

There remain of Salomon's Works, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Salomon. In the first he teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the second, the vanity of humane nature; in the third, he singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Book intitled, The Wisdom of Salomon (which some give unto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author thereof) Hierome and many others of the best learned make us think it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri sapientie (saith Hierome) qui Salomonis inscribitur, Græcam redolet eloquentiam; The Style of the Book of wisdom, which is ascribed to Salomon, favoureth of the Græcian eloquence; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he confesseth in the nineteenth Book, and twentieth Chapter of the City of God, that the Author of that Book hath a direct foretelling of the passion of Christ in these words: Circumveniamus justum, quoniam insuavis est nobis, &c. Let us surround the righteous, for he is unpleasant to us, he is contrary to our doings, he checketh us for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to have the knowledge of God, and he calleth himself the son of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following words point directly at Christ. The Books of Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, and Canonica Canticorum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi ascribeth to Isay the Prophet. Suidas and Cedrenus report, that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graved the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which (they say) Ezechias pulled down, because the people, neglecting help from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries.

Of Salomon's Books of Invocations, and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expel evil spirits, Josephus hath written at large, though (as I conceive) rather out of his own invention, or from some uncertain report, than truly.

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the root in Salomon's ring disposset divers persons of evil spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly, so strange an example of humane frailty hath never been read of as this King: who having received Wisdom from God himself, in honour of whom, and for his only service, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Israel and Judea, not by the law of Nature, but by the love of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weak and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giver of all goodnes, of which he was more liberal to this King, than to any that ever the world had. Of whom Syracides writeth in this manner: Salomon reigned in a peaceable time, and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a house to his Name, and prepare the Sanctuary for ever; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with understanding, as with a fount? Thy mind covered the whole earth, and hath filled it with grave and dark sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Iles, and for thy peace thou wast beloved, &c. but thus he concludeth: Thou didst bow thy loins to Women, and wast overcome by thy body; thou didst stain thine honour, and hast defiled thy posterity, and hast brought wrath upon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly, cap. 27.

§. VI.

Of the Contemporaries of Salomon.

Near the beginning of Salomons reign, Agessilus the third of the Heraclidae in Corinth; Labotes in Lacedemon; and soon after Silvius Alba, the fourth of the Silvii, swayd those Kingdoms: Laefibenes then governing Assyria, Agastus and Archippus the second and third Princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In the six and twentieth of Salomons reign, Hiram of Tyre dyed, to whom Balastus succeeded, and reigned seventeen years, after Mercators account; who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sons. Josephus gives him fewer years. Theophilus Antiochenus against Antolicus finds Borzorius the next after Hiram, if there be not some Kings omitted between the death of Hiram and the reign of Borzorius.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sefac or Shishak (as our English Geneva terms him) began to govern in Egypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sofachis; Josephus, Sufac; Cedrenus, Suseffius; Eusebius in the column of the Egyptian Kings, Smendes; and in that of the Hebrews, Sufac. Josephus in the eighth of his Antiquities, reproverth it as an error in Herodorus, that he ascribeth the Acts of Sufac to Sefosiris, which perchance Herodorus might have done by comparison, accounting Sefac another Sefosiris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and virtues of King Sefosiris, I have spoken already in the story of the Egyptian Princes: only in this he was re-proved, that he caused four of his captive Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be seen, and to ride in triumph: one of which four, saith Entropius, at such time as Sefosiris was carried out to take the air, cast his head continually back upon the two foremost wheels next him; which Sefosiris perceiving, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion: to whom the captive King answered, That in those he beheld the instability of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheel was suddenly carried about, and became the highest, and the upmost part was as suddenly turned downward, and under all: which when Sefosiris had judiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like servitude in the future. Of this Sefosiris, and that he could not be taken for Sefac, I have spoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Salomons Successors until the end of Jehosaphat.

§. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings; the defection of the ten Tribes, and Jeroboams Idolatry.

Rehoboam the Son of Salomon by Nabamah an Ammonitess, now forty years old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended the return of Jeroboam as yet in Egypt, since he fled thither, fearing Salomon. After his arrival the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmius ei fore Imperium, si amari mallet quam metui; So should his Empire (saith Josephus) be more assured, if he desired rather to be beloved than feared: whereof he took three days to deliberate before his answer; of whom therefore it could not be said as of David, that that he was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himself he knew not how to resolve, so had he not the judgement to discern of Counsels; which is the very test of wisdom in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those grave and advised men, that served his Father, who perswaded him by all means to satisfy the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and favourites, not only to continue on the backs of his subjects those burdens which greatly crulth them; but (vaunting falsely of greatness exceeding his fathers) he threatned in sharp, or rather in terrible terms, to lay yet heavier, and more unupportable loads on them. But as it appeared in the success, those younger advisers greatly mistook the nature of severity, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it self: they also were ignorant that it ought to be used for the help, and not for the harm of subjects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cords or fetters have ever lasted long, but those which have been twisted and forged by love only? His witless parasites could well judge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and enabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboam did not a little advance Jeroboams designs. For being foretold by the Prophet Achiah of his future advancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples love into fury) confirmed and gave courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arrived, than elected King of Israel: the people cried out, What portion have we in David? we have no inheritance in the Son of Israh. Now though themselves, even all the Tribes of Israel, had consented to *David*s anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgot both the bands of nature, and their duty to God; and as all alienate resolved hearts do, they served themselves for the present, with impudent excuses. And now over-late, and after-time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people; a man most hateful to all his Subjects, to pacify them: whom they instantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all speed, and recovered Jerusalem, where preparing to invade Israel, with an hundred and fourscore thousand chosen men, Spimei in the person of God commanding to the contrary, all was stayed for the present. In the mean time Jeroboam the new King fortified Shechem on this side, and Pennel on the other side of Jordan; and fearing that the Union and exercise of one Religion would also joyn the peoples hearts again to the House of David, and having in all likelihood also promised the Egyptians to follow their Idolatry, he set up two Calves of gold for the children of Israel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these he represented those Gods which delivered them out of Egypt, and refusing the service of the Levites, he made Priests fit for such gods. It must needs be that by banishing the Levites which served David and Solomon through all Israel, Jeroboam greatly enriched himself as taking into his hands all those Cities which were given them by Moses and Joshua, for as it is written, The Levites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Juda &c. This irreligious policy of Jeroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that never could be rooted out, until Israel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by Prophecy and Miracles impugned sufficiently when it first began; but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophecy nor Miracle could make them yield. Jeroboam could not be moved now by the Authority of Abia, who from the Lord had first promised unto him the Kingdom; nor by the withering of his own hand as he stretched it over the Altar, which also clave asunder according to the sign, which the man of God had given him by the commandment of God, who again recovered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obstinate as before, for he held it the safest course in policy to proceed as he had begun. This impious invention of Jeroboam, who forsook God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a modern Historian compared with the policies of late Ages; observing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian born. *Sic qui hodie (saith he) politici vocantur, & propria commoda presentefq; utilitates sibi tanquam ultimum finem constituunt, causam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promovenda, conservanda, amplianda, nihil non faciendum putant. called Politicians, propounding to themselves, as their utmost end and scope, their own commodity and present profit, are wont to allege the case of state forsooth, as the principal point to be regarded: for the good of the state, for advancing, preserving, or encreasing of the state, they think that they may do any thing. If they mean to oppress their neighbours, to overturn all laws of Justice and Liberty, if Religion it self must go to wrack, yea, if all rights of God and man must be violated, they will try all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will do any thing, let all go to ruin what care they, so long as they may have what they would: as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of ragione del stato, did serve as well to uphold, as at the first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatry of the ten Tribes. Upon this ground Amazias the Priest of Bethel counselled the Prophet Amos not to prophesie at Bethel, For (saith he) it is the Kings Court. Upon this ground even Jehoi that had massacred the Priests of Baal, in zeal for the Lord, yet would not in any wife depart from that politique fin of Jeroboam the son of Nabat, which made Israel to sin. It was reason of state that perswaded the last French King Henry the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Protestants whom he forsook, obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom he followed, murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizor of wife proceeding delude even those that know the foul face of impiety lurking under it: and behold the wretched ends that have ever followed it, whereof Jehoi, and all the Kings of Israel had, and were themselves very great examples.

§. II.

Of Rehoboam his impiety; for which he was punished by Sefac: of his end, and Contemporaries.

While Jeroboam was occupied in setting up his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side, having now little hope to recover the Provinces lost, strengthened the principal places remaining with all endeavour; for he fortified and victualled fifteen Cities of Juda and Benjamin: not that he feared Jeroboam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Jeroboam had not only fastned himself, but withall invited them to invade Juda: laying perchanse before them the uncountable Riches of David and Salomon, which might now be easily had, seeing ten of the twelve Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Judeans. So as by those two waies (of late years often trodden) to wit, change of Religion, and invitation of forraign force, Jeroboam hoped to settle himself in the seat of Israel, whom yet the powerful God for his Idolatry in few years after rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam having also, as he thought, by fortifying divers places, assured his estate, forsook the law of the living God, and made high Places, and Images, and Groves, on every high Hill, and under every green Tree.

And therefore in the fifth year of his reign, Sefac or Shishac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom, as well Adad as Idumea, as Jeroboam were familiar, and his instruments; entered Judea with twelve thousand Chariots, and three score thousand Horse, besides Foot-men, which Josephus numbers at four hundred thousand. This Army was compounded of four Nations: Egyptians, Lubbeans, Succians, and Chusites. The Lubbeans were Lybeans the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the Westside. The Lubbeans were of Petrea, and of the desert Arabia which afterwards followed Zera against Asa King of Juda. The Succians according to Junius his opinion, were of Scythia, which signifieth Tents: he doth suppose that they were the Troglodites, mentioned often in Ptolemy, Ptolemy, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not far from the banks of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward, about six hundred English miles from the best & Maritime part of Egypt; and therefore I do not think that the Succians or Succai were those Troglodites, but rather those Arabians which Ptolemy calls Arabes Egyptii, Ichthyophagi, which possess that part of Egypt behind the mountains called Alabastri, and the red Sea, far nearer Egypt and readier to be levied than those removed Savages of the Troglodites.

With this great and powerful Army, Sefac invaded Judea, and (besides many other strong Cities) wan Jerusalem it self, of which and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoyle, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which David recovered from Adadazer, in the Syrian war: these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of brass, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality, whom Syracides calleth, The foolishness of the people.

From this time forward the King of Egypt claimed the sovereignty of Judea, and held the Jews as their Tributaries: Sefac, as it seems, rendering up to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out out of the word of God, where premising the deliverance of Juda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leave them under the yoke of Egypt, in these words, Nevertheless they (to wit, the Judeans) shall be his servants, that is, the servants of Sefac.

After this overthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelve years, and his losses received by Sefac, notwithstanding, he continued the war against Jeroboam all his life time. After his death Jeroboam governed Israel four years.

Rehoboam lived 52 years, and reigned 17. his story was written at large by Shemejah and Hiddon the Prophets, but the same persified with that of Nathan, and the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tersippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Governors for life after Codrus, governed in Athens, Abdasartus, or Abdrartus, in Tyre, Dorissius the fifth of the Heracidae in Sparta, according to Eusebius (others make him the six) and Priminus the fourth in Corinth. Over the Latines reigned Silvius, Alba Silvius Atys, the fourth and the fifth of the Silvii.

About the 12. of Rehoboam, Abdasartus King of Tyre was murdered by his Nurfes sons, or foster-brethren, the elder of which usurped the Kingdom twelve years.

Toward his latter times Perietades, or Pyrrhiades, began to govern Assyria, the 34. King thereof: and not long after Asartus, the son of Baldastartus, recovered the Kingdom of Tyre from the Usurpers.

§. III.

Of the great battel between Jeroboam and Abia, with a Corollarie of the examples of Gods judgments.

Abijah the son of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdom, and his vices. He raised an Army of four hundred thousand, with which he invaded Jeroboam, who encountered him with a double number of eight hundred thousand: Both Armies joyned near to the Mount Ephraim, where Jeroboam was utterly overthrow, and the strength of Israel broken: for there fell of that side five hundred thousand; the greatest overthrow that ever was given or received of those Nations. Abijah being now master of the field, recovered Bethel, Jelamah, and Ephron. Soon after which discomfiture, Jeroboam died: who reigned in all 22. years, Abijah, the better to strengthen himself, entred into league with Hesien, the third of the Adads of Syria, as may be gathered out of the 2. of Chron, he reigned but three years, and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Ido the Prophet as some part of his Fathers were.

Here we see how it pleased God to punish the sins of Salomon in his son Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and Traytor: and then by the successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he served God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings, and when he forsook him, it was torn alunder by his meanest Vassals. Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sefac; For the son Abijah was able to leavy four hundred thousand men, and with the same number he overthrow eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them five hundred thousand; God giving spirit, courage, and invention, when and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were exprest, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their people; the same being both before, and at the instant delivered by Prophets: so the same just God, who liveth and governeth all things for ever, doth in these our times give victory, courage, and discourage, raise, and throw down Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: for which reason, in these and other the afflictions of Israel, always the causes are set down, that they might be as precedents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in David's time for three years, For Saul and his bloody house, &c. And David towards his latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrows in effect, for Uriah, Salomon had ten Tribes of twelve torn from his son for his Idolatry. Rehoboam was spoiled of his Riches and Honour by Sefac of Egypt, because the people of Juda made Images, High places, and Groves, &c. and because they suffered Sodomites in the Land. Jeroboam was punished in himself and his posterity, for the golden Calves that he erected. Joram had all his sons slain by the Philistims, and his very bowels torn out of his body by an excoriating flix, for murdering his brethren. Abab and Jezabel were slain, the blood of one, the body of the other eaten with dogs, for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same, and the like sins in all after-times, and in these our daies by the same famine, plagues, war, loss, vexation, death, sickness and calamities; howsoever the wife men of the World raise these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents, which, as being next their eyes and ears, seem to them to work every alteration that happeneth.

§. IV.

Of Afa and his Contemporaries.

TO Abijah succeeded Afa, who enjoyed peace for his first ten years, in which time he established the Church of God, breaking down the alters dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting down their groves, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his own mother, who was an Idolatress, but deposing her from her regency, brake her Idol, stamp it, and burnt it. He also fortified many Cities, and other places, providing (as provident Kings do) for the troubles of war in the leisure of peace. For not long after he was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Judea, and with such a multitude entred the territory of Afa, as (for any thing that I have read) were never assembled of that Nation, either before or since: For it is written, that there came against the Judeans, Zerah of Ethiopia, with an host of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Afa encountered with an Army of five hundred and fourscore thousand levied out of those two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, which obeyed him, and with which he overthrew this fearful multitude, and had the spoyle both of their Cities and Camps.

* In the former book, c. 4, §. 14, c. 8, §. 10, 16.

That this Zerah was not an Ethiopian, I have * proved already, and were it but the length between Ethiopia and Judea, and the strong flourishing Regions of Egypt inter-jacent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to pass through them) it were sufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is, that these invaders were *Ethiopian*s. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoiled by the Judeans, in following their victory, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth upon the torrent of Egor, which David past over when he surprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this proveth sufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier town standing on the uttermost South-border of all Judea, from all parts of Ethiopia six hundred miles. All the spoiles which Afa took as the cattel, camels, and sheep, whereof he sacrificed five thousand, shew them to be Arabians adjoining, and not far off, and not unknown *Ethiopian*s. And if it be objected that these desert countries can hardly yield a million of men fit for the wars. I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petraea, and the Desert, which compass two parts of the holy Land, should yield ten hundred thousand, as that two Tribes of the twelve, should arm five hundred and fourscore thousand. Besides, it answered to the promise of God to Abraham, that these Nations should exceed in number; for God spake it of Israel, that he would make him fruitful, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelve Princes, &c.

Bascha a King of Israel began to reign in the third of Afa, and fearing the greatness of Afa after his great victory, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadzer, to joyn with him against Afa, and to the end to block him up, he fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Jerusalem toward *Samar*ia.

This war began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. year of Afa his reign: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Bascha died in the 26. year of Afa; therefore could not Bascha begin this war in the 35. of Afa his reign, but in the 35. year of the division of Juda and Israel, for so many years it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. years, to the 16. of Afa. It may seem strange, that Afa being able to bring into the field an Army of five hundred and fourscore thousand good Souldiers, did not easily drive away Bascha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Jeroboam, and of Afa himself against Zerah, being yet fresh in mind, which might well have emboldened the men of Juda, and asmuch disheartened the enemies. Questionless there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused Afa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the employment of so many hundred thousands of hands, in the late service against Zerah, had caused many mens private busineses to lye undispatched, where by the people being now intentive to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be unwilling to stir against the Israelites, choosing rather to wink at apparent inconvenience, which the building of Rama would bring upon them in after-times. Such backwardness of the people might have deterred Afa from adventuring himself with the least part of his forces, and committing the success into the hands of God. Howsoever it were, he took the treasures remaining in the temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Bascha, whose employments Benhadad badad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Bascha. For the Israelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himself (after his invasion) nor his successors after him ever gave over, till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdom. So Benhadad being now entred into Nephtalim, without resistance, he spoiled divers principal Cities thereof, and enforced Bascha to quit Rama, and to leave the same to Afa, with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done, Benhadad, who loved neither party, being laden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Juda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Afa, in that he now relied on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himself on the favour and assistance of God, he not only caused Hanani to be imprisoned, but he began to burden and oppress his people, and was therefore stricken with the grievous paines of the gout in his feet, wherewith after he had been two years continually tormented, he gave up the ghost when he had reigned 41. years.

There lived with Afa, Agefiass the fixt of the Heracleide, and Bacis the fixt King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his successors were afterward called Bacidae. Astartus, and Asparinus were Kings in Tyre. Astartus took revenge on his brother Phelletes, for the murder of Ithobalus Priest of the goddess Astarta, whom Salomon in dotage worshipped. Alys and Capsy ruled the Latines: Pirribiades and Opbratens the Assyrians: Terpsigms and Phorbas the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Egypt; who dying in the 36. year of Afa, left Cheops his succellour, that reigned fifty six years, even to the 16. of Jons.

§. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reign of Afa.

IN the reign of Afa the Kingdom of Israel felt great and violent commotions, which might have reduced the ten Tribes under their former allegiance to the house of David, if the wilddom of God had not otherwise determined. The wickedness of Jeroboam had, in his later daies, the sentence of heavy vengeance laid upon it, by the mouth of Abia, the same Prophet which had foretold the division of Israel, for the sin of Salomon, and his reign over the ten Tribes. One son Jeroboam had among others, in whom only God found so much piety, as (though it sufficed not to withhold his wrath from that family) it procured unto him a peaceable end; an honourable testimony of the peoples love, by their general mourning and lamentation at his death; and (wherein he was most happy) the favourable approbation of God himself.

After the loss of this good son, the ungodly father was soon taken away: a miserable creature, so conscious of his vile unthankfulness to God, that he durst not suffer his own name to be used in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruine hanging over him and his, yea of Gods extrem hatred; yet forbearing to destroy those accursed Idols that wrought his confusion. So loath he was to forsake his worldly wilddom, when the world was ready to forsake him; and all belonging to him, his hateful memory excepted.

Nadab the son of Jeroboam, reigned in the second and third years of Afa, which are reckoned as two years, though indeed his fathers last year of two and twenty did run along (how far is uncertain) with the second of Afa, whose third year was the first of Bascha, so that perhaps this Nadab enjoyed not his Kingdom one whole year. He did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seems that he little feared the judgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his own estate, he armed all Israel against the Philistines, and besieged one of their Towns. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill success, and recalled to mind their grievous loss of five hundred thousand under Jeroboam, counting it an unlucky family to the Nation; or whether by some particular indifferencie, he exasperated them) slain he was by Bascha, whom the Army did willingly accept for King in his stead. Bascha was no sooner proclaimed King, than he began to take order with the house of Jeroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercy, to the sword. That he did this for private respects, and not in regard of Gods will to have it so, it is evident by his continuing in the same form of Idolatry which Jeroboam had begun. Wherefore he received the same sentence from God that had been laid upon Jeroboam; which was executed upon him also in the same sort. He began to infect Afa, by fortifying Ramah; but was diverted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Country, destroying all the Land of Nephtalim. Four and twenty years he reigned, and then dying, left the Crown to Eli his son; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the son of Jeroboam had done,

Ela was as much an Idolater as his father: and withal a riotous person. He sent an Army against Gibbethon, the same town of the Philistines, before which Nadab the son of Jeroboam perished; but he sat at home the whilst, feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby he gave such advantage against himself, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behaviour so contemptible, conceived hope of the like fortune as Baasha had found, by doing as Baasha had done. Wherefore he did set upon Ela in his drunkenness, and slew him. Presently upon which fact, he filled himself King of Israel: and began his reign with massacring all the house of Baasha; extending his cruelty not only to his children, and kinsfolk, but unto all his friends in Tirza. These news were quickly blown to the Camp at Gibbethon, where they were not welcomed according to Zimri's expectation. For the Souldiers in stead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitting the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in short space they may seem to have forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the City, not courage to keep himself from falling alive into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace, consuming it and himself together to ashes. Seven daies he is said to have reigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Camp. For Zimri was also an Idolater, walking in the way of Jeroboam; and therefore is likely to have had more time wherein to declare himself, than the reign of seven daies, and those consumed partly in murdering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to have defended his own life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the fiction of Omri; whereby it may seem, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set up a new head, who doubtless would never have appeared, if there had not been ready by his hand, some strength, not unlikely to resist and vanquish the Army which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new competitor of Omri, held out, I do not find; only it appears that his side was decayed, and so he died, leaving no other Successor than his concurrent.

§. VI.

A conjecture of the causes hindering the reunion of Israel with Juda, which might have been effected by these troubles.

Any man that shall consider the state of Israel in those times, may justly wonder how it came to pass, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already suffered under these unfortunate Princes, and with the present civil wars, did not return to their ancient Kings, and re-unite themselves with the mighty Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chose the one to endure a desperate necessity of yielding, or burning himself, the other to languish away as a man forsaken; than to have recourse unto a remedy, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that GOD was pleased to have it so, were a true, but an idle answer (for his secret will is the cause of all things) unless it could be proved; that he had forbidden Asa to deal in that business, as he forbade Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God upon Rehoboam, did only bind his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appears by the War continued between Israel and Juda, so many years following: wherein Abia so far prevailed, that he won a great battail, and recovered some Towns belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his own Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly look into the second causes moving the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing under new upstarts, rather than to cast their eyes upon that Royal house of David, from which the succession of five Kings in lineal descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have been laid upon the mean beginnings thereof. To think that Omri had prevented his Competitors in making peace with Asa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not only an Idolater, but did worse than all the Kings before him; which as it might serve alone to prove, that Asa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which he professed to take at the very first, of revenging the massacre committed upon the family and friends of Baasha (Asa his mortal enemy) gives manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should should more justly than he have expected the friendship of Juda in that quarrel. Wherefore in searching out the reason of this backwardness in the ten Tribes (which was such, that they may seem to have never thought upon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Princes; it were not amiss to examine the causes moving the people to revenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard rather than of Nadab the son of Jeroboam, who followed the Wars in person, as a man of spirit and courage. Surely it is apparent, that the very first defection of the ten Tribes, was (if we look upon humane reason) occasioned by desire of breaking that heavy yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their necks. Their desire was to have a King that should not oppress them; not to have no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediately choose Jeroboam in his stead, as a man likely to afford that liberty unto them, for which he had contended in their behalf. Neither were they (as it seems) herein altogether deceived. For his affection of popularity appears in his building of decayed Towers, and in the institution of his new devised Idolatry; where he told the people, that it was too much for them to travel so far as to Jerusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to cease, towards the latter end of his reign, and in the reign of his son, when long time of possession had confirmed his stile, which at the first was only good by courtesy of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in such cases) were more offended by some prerogatives of a King, that he still retained in his own hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens, it is clearly apparent, that the whole Army of all Israel joyned with Baasha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Jeroboam's house.

Now the reign of Baasha himself, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) every way unfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was cast away; the other side of his Kingdom harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one Town of Gibbethon from the Philistines, but left that business to his son, who likewise appears an unprofitable sluggard. Wherefore it must needs be, that the favour of the people toward the house of Baasha grew from his good form of Civil Government, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Jeroboam ever meant to do. And surely he that shall take pains to look into those examples which are extant of the different courses, held by the Kings of Israel and Juda, in administration of justice, will find it most probable, that upon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued to avege from the line of David; as to think all adversity more tolerable, than the weighty Scepter of that house. For the death of Joab and Shimei was indeed by them deserved; yet in that they suffered it without form of judgment, they suffered like unto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without judgment, and without any crime objected, other than the Kings jealousy: out of which by the same rule of arbitrary justice (under which it may be supposed that many were cast away) he would have slain Jeroboam (if he could have caught him) before he had yet committed any offence; as appears by his confident return out of Egypt, like one that was known to have endured wrong, having not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Jezebel did upon his brethren, and upon sundry of his greatest men; as also Joab did so put to death Zachariah the son of Jebojada, who had made him King, even in the court of the house of the Lord: and Manasses did shed innocent blood exceeding much, till he replenished Jerusalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; besides his sin, wherewith he made Juda to sin. Contrariwise, among the Kings of Israel we find no monument of such arbitrary proceeding, unless perhaps the words of Jezebel the son of Abab (which were but words) may be taken for an instance, when he said, God do so to me, and more also, if the head of Elihu the son of Shaphat shall stand on him this day: whereby it is not plain whether he meant to kill him without more ado, or to have him condemned as a false Prophet, that had made them hold out against the Aramites, till they were fain to eat their own children; which he thought a sufficient argument to prove, that it was not Gods purpose to deliver them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the liberty which the Israelites enjoyed, than any peremptory execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not fear to stand upon his own right, though Abab were even sick for anger; neither was he for that cause put to death, as upon commandement, but made away by conspiracy, the matter being handled after a judicial form, which might give satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the device, though to God it could not.

The murder of the Prophets is continually ascribed to Jezebel, an impudent Woman, and

and not unto the King her husband. Neither is it certain, that there was no Law made whereby their lives were taken from them; but certain it is, that the people being Idolaters, were both pleased with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Juda (such as are registered) prove them to use a more absolute manner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither do their sufferings witness the contrary. For of those which reigned over Juda, from the division of the Kingdom, to the captivity of the ten Tribes, three were slain by the people, and two were denied a burial amongst their Ancestors. Yea, the death of Abazias and his brethren, slain by Jehoi, with the destruction of all that Royal seed of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can read) stir up in the people any such thirst of revenge, as might by the suddenness and uniformity testify the affection to be general, and proceeding from a loving remembrance of their Princes: unless we should think that the death of Athalia, after seven years reign, were occasioned rather by the memory of her ill purchasing, than by the present sense of her tyrannical abusing the government, whereon she had seized. On the other side, such of the Kings of Israel as perished by treason (which were seven of the twenty) were all slain by conspiracy of the great men, who aspired by treason to the Crown: the people being so far from embroiling their hands in the blood of their Sovereigns, that (after Nadab) they did never forbear to revenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approve the good success of treason, unless fear compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being thoroughly revenged upon other two, namely the death of Eli and Zacharia, upon Zimri and Shallum, who traitorously got and usurped, for a little while, their places; only three of the seven remain, whose ends how the people took, it may be doubtful. Though indeed it is precisely said of the slaughter committed on Abab's children by Jehoi, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly afraid: and the same fear might be in them at the death of Peka, whose History (as others of that time) is cursorily passed over. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that never any of them perished by fury of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them; neither was there any motive urging so forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as fear lest the people should stir in their quarrel. And certainly (howsoever all that the Law calls treason, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which have here most prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched it self with the blood of some great Officers; no such rebellions, howsoever wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their natural Sovereign, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten upon his Royal person: which if any man impute unto gross ignorance, another may more charitably, and I think, more truly, ascribe to a reverent affection. Wherefore that Fable of Briareus, who, being loosened by Pallas, did with his 100. hands give assistance to Jupiter, when all the rest of the gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying that Monarchies need not to fear any curbing of their absoluteness by mighty subjects, as long as by wisdom they keep the hearts of the people, who will be sure to come in on their side. Though indeed the Story might very well have born the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Homer, who tells us that Pallas was one of the conspiracy, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by loosening Briareus. For a good Form of Government sufficeth by it self to retain the people, not only without assistance of a laborious Wit, but even against all devices of the greatest and shrewdest Politicians: every Sheriff and Constable, being sooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalf, than any over-weening Rebel, how mighty soever, can against him.

This declaration of the peoples love, being seldom found in Juda, makes it very likely, that the rule it self of government there was such, as neither gave occasion of contentment unto the subjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Upon which reasons it may seem that the multitude was kept usually disarmed. For otherwise it would have been almost impossible, that Athalia the sister of Abab, a stranger to the Royal blood of Juda, should by the only authority of a Queen-mother have destroyed all the seed of David, and usurped the Kingdom very near 7. years, without finding any resistance. Yea when Jehoiada the high Priest had agreed with the Captains and principal men of the Land to set up Jo, as their lawful King, whereunto the whole Nation were generally well affected, he was fain to give to these Captains and King men, the spears and the shields that were King David's, and were in the house of the Lord. But we need not enter into such particulars. Quest-

Questionless, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their duty toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their own choice or admission, holding the Crown by a more uncertain tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the ten Tribes did never seek to return to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their six first Kings, which died in the reign of Asa, admitted a seventh of a new Family, rather than they would consubject themselves with those of Juda and Benjamin, under a more honourable, but more heavy yoke.

So Asa having seen the death of 7. Kings of Israel, did himself after one and forty years reign, leaving Jehoshaphat his son to deal with Abab the son of Omri, who was the eighth King over the ten Tribes.

Of Jehoshaphat and his contemporaries.

Jehoshaphat, who succeeded Asa, was a Prince religious and happy, he destroyed all the Groves, Altars, and high places dedicated to Idolatry, and sent Teachers to all places and people wanting instruction; he recovered the tribute due unto him by the Arabians and Philistines: from the one he had silver, from the other sheep and goats to the number of fifteen thousand and four hundred. The numbers of men of War were more than admirable; for it is written that Adnab had the command of three hundred thousand, Jehobanan of two hundred and fourscore thousand, and Amasia of two hundred thousand; also that he had, besides these in Benjamin, of those that bare shields, which we call Targetiers, and of Archers under Eliada, two hundred thousand, and under the commandment of Jehozabab a hundred and fourscore thousand: which numbered together make eleven hundred and sixty thousand, all which are said to have waited upon the King, besides his Garrisons.

That Juda and Benjamin, a Territory not much exceeding the County of Kent, should muster eleven hundred and sixty thousand fighting men, it is very strange, and the number far greater than it was found upon any other view. Joab in David's time found five hundred thousand: Jehobanan found but an hundred and fourscore thousand: Abia four hundred and eight thousand: Asa five hundred and fourscore thousand: Amasia inrolled all that could bear arms, and they amounted to three hundred thousand. Surely, whereas it is written that when news was brought to Jehoshaphat that Mosab and Ammon were entered his Territory to the West of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, he feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that he would have feared even the Army of Xerxes, if he could have brought into the field 11. hundred and 60. thousand fighting men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (criticising my self to better judgment) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the 17. distributed to several Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the 300. thousand under Adnab, and the 200. and fourscore thousand under Jehobanan, were afterward commanded and mustered by Amasiah, Eliad, and Jehozabab: for the gross and total is not in that place set down, as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Again, as the aids which Jehoshaphat brought to Abab did not shew that he was a Prince of extraordinary power, so the Mosabites and Ammonites which he feared, could never make the one half of those numbers, which he that commanded least among Jehoshaphat's Leaders had under him.

This mighty Prince, notwithstanding his greatness, yet he joyined in friendship with Abab King of Israel, who had married that wicked Woman Jezabel. Him Jehoshaphat visited at Samarita, and caused his son Joram to marry Athalia, this Abab's Daughter.

Abab perswaded Jehoshaphat to assist him in the War against the Syrians, who held the City of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together four hundred of his Prophets, or Eadites, to fore-tel the success: who promised him Victory. But Jehoshaphat believed nothing at all in those diviners, but resolved first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Abab made answer that he had one called Atichabab, but he hated that Prophet, because he always fore-told of evil, and never of any good towards him. Yet Atichabab was sent for to the King; but by the way the messenger prayed him to consent with the rest of the Prophets, and to promise Victory unto them, as they did. But Atichabab spake the truth, and repeated his Vision to both the Kings, which was, that God asked who shall persuade Abab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that he would enter into his Prophets, and be in them a false spirit to deceive. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestri

Sri loquitur in vobis. It is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaks in you: so in a contrary kind did the devil in the Prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his destruction. And as P. Martyr upon this place well observeth, these evil spirits are ministers of Gods vengeance, and are used as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime employ, For as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to save and deliver from destruction, of which the Scriptures have many examples: so on the contrary, it is by the evil that he punisheth and destroyeth; both which are said to perform the Will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a second sort of malignant natures, but they are everywhere visible. There are spirits, faith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on fire strokes. In the time of destruction they shew forth their power, and accomplish the will of him that made them.

Now Michaias having by this his revelation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets, whose spirit he discovered, was stroken by Zidkiah one of Baal's Prophets, and by Achab himself committed to prison: where he appointed him to be reserved and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaias, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou return in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me. Nevertheless Achab went on in that War, and was wounded to death. Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem, where he was reprehended by Jehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damascens, joyned with the Moabites, Ammonites and Edumians to invade Judea: who pass Jordan and encamp at Engaddi; and when Jehoshaphat gathered his Army, the Prophet Jehaziel fore-told him of the Victory, which should be obtained without any blood-shed of his part: and so when Jehoshaphat approached, this Assembly of Nations, the Ammonites and Moabites, disagreeing with the Edumians, and quarrelling for some causes among themselves, those of Ammon and Moab set upon the Edumians, and brake them utterly: which done, they also invaded each other; in which broil Jehoshaphat arriving, took the spoil of them all without any loss of his part, as it was fore-told and promised by God. Notwithstanding this Victory, Jehoshaphat, forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for assisting an idolatrous King, did notwithstanding joyn with Ochazias, the son of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like return which Salomon had: but as Eliezer the Prophet fore-told him, his ships perished, and were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprise was overthrown.

Yet he taketh part with Jehoram, the brother of Ochazias, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Juda and Israel, the Edomites joyn their Forces, not forgetting, it seems, that the Moabites, assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their Army.

The Moabites, subject to David and Salomon, forsaking the Kings of Juda, gave themselves for vassals to Jeroboam, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Achab: but Jehoshaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatry of his Colleague, yet as it seemeth he was drawn into this War, both to be avenged of the Moabites for their defection from Juda to Israel, as also because they had lately joyned themselves with the Syrians against Jehoshaphat, and thirdly, to punish their double rebellion who first forsook Juda, and now Israel.

Both Kings resolved to pass by the way of Idumea, thereby the better to assure that Nations for we find that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi against Jehoshaphat: But whether they had then declared themselves against Jehoshaphat, it is not certain; for in the 2. of Chron. 14. vers. 8. it is written, that in the time of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat, Edom rebelled: and therefore it seemeth to me that the Edomites, when they were slain by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to return from them, and to joyn themselves with the Army of Juda. For that they were numbered among the enemies of Jehoshaphat, it is plain in the 2. of Chron. 16. 20. and as plain c. 21. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Jehoshaphat's death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the year, or whether the Idumeans having a purpose to rebel, misled the Army of Juda and Israel, with intent to infeeble them for want of Water; true it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirst than the Armies of Cressus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had in all likelihood utterly perished, had not Elisba taught them to cut trenches wherinto the water sprang, by which not only Jehoshaphat and his Army, but Jehoram King of Israel an Idolater was relieved: the great mercy and goodness of God having ever been prone to save the evil for the good, whereas he never destroyed the good for the evil.

The miserable issue of this War, and how Moab burnt his son, or the son of the King of of Edom, for sacrifice, on the rampire of his own City, I have already written in the life of Jehoram among the Kings of Israel. Jehoshaphat reigned 25. years and died; he was buried in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and a part of the Pyramis set over his grave is yet to be seen, faith Brocard. His acts are written at large by Jehu the son of Hanani.

There lived with Jehoshaphat, Ophratenes in Affrya, Capetus, and Tiberinus Kings of the Albans in Italy; of the latter the river Tiber (formerly Albula) took name.

In Jehoshaphat's time also ruled Mecades or Mezades in Athens: Agelos or Agosilans in Corinth; and Archilais of the same race of the Heraclide the seventh in Lacedaemon. Baderis ruled the Tyrrians; Achub, Ochazias and Jehoram the Israelites.

CHAP. XX.

Of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat, and Ahazias.

That Jehoram was made King sundry times.

Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat King of Juda began to reign at thirty two years of age, and lived until he was forty years old, being eight years a King; but of these eight years, which Jehoram is said to have reigned, four are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian war with Abab, left this Jehoram King in his stead, as Abab did his son Ahazias. This appears by the several beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the two Jehorams Kings of Israel and Juda, and to Ahazias the eldest son of Abab. For Ahazias is said to have begun his reign, in the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat. Jehoram the brother of Ahazias succeeded him in the 2. year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat King of Juda; that is, in the next year after that Jehoram of Juda was designed King by his father; it being (as we find elsewhere) the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat himself, who went with the Israelites against Moab. Hereby it appears that the full power and execution of the royal office was retained still by Jehoshaphat, who governed absolutely by himself, not communicating the rule with his son. But in the fifth year of Jehoram King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Jehoshaphat, the old King took unto him, as partner in the government, this his eldest son, who was at that time 32. years old, his father being 57. Now forasmuch as Jehoshaphat reigned 25. years, it is evident that his son did not reign alone till the eighth of Joram King of Israel. The like regard is to be had in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda and Israel, who did not always reign precisely so long as the bare letter of the Text may seem at first to affirm: but their years were sometimes complete, sometimes only current, sometimes confounded with the years of their successors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the years of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing less needful than curious, to enquire into the reasons moving Jehoshaphat either to assume unto him his son as partner in the Kingdom, whilst he was able himself to command both in peace and in war, the like having never been done by any of his progenitors, or having once (in the 17. of his reign) vouchsafed unto him that honor, to resume it to himself, or at least wise to defer the confirmation of it, until four or five years were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a mean to find some light, whereby we may more clearly discover the causes of much extraordinary business ensuing, I hold it not amiss to make such conjecture, as the circumstances of the story briefly handled in the Scriptures may seem to approve.

We are therefore to consider, that this King Jehoshaphat was the first of Jehorams that ever entered into any straight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much labour and long war, tired themselves in vain, making small profit of the greatest advantages that could be wished. Wherefore Jehoshaphat thought it the wisest way to make a league offensive and defensive between Israel and Juda, whereby each might enjoy their own in quiet.

This confederacy made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true root and fountain of all wisdom: yet as a piece of sound policy, doubtless it wanted not fair pretences

1 King. 22. v. 51.

2 King. 1. 17.

1 King. 3. 1. 1. 59.

2 King. 8. 16.

pretences of much common good thereby likely to arise, with mutual fortification of both those Kingdoms, against the uncommunicated Nations their ancient enemies. This apparent benefit, being so inestimable a jewel, that it might not easily be lost, but continue as hereditary from father to son, it was thought a very good course to have it confirmed by some sure bond of affinity, and thereupon was Abitha the daughter of Omri, and sister of Abab King of Israel, given in marriage to Jehoram, who was son and heir apparent to the King of Juda. This Lady was of a masculine spirit, and had learned of much of Queen Jezabel her brothers wife; that she durst undertake, and could thoroughly perform a great deal more in Jerusalem, than the other knew how to compass in Samarita. She was indeed a fire-brand ordained by God to consume a great part of the nobility houses in Juda, and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisdom, regardless of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian war at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda and Israel did adventure equally, but the profit of the victory should have redounded wholly to Abab: as godly Princes very seldom thrive by marching with Idolaters, but rather serve the turns of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himself cannot be well affected to his servants. Before their setting forth, Abab designed, as King, his son Abaziah, not so much perhaps in regard of the uncertain events of war (for none of his predecessors had ever done the like, upon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the prophet Asaiah (for he despised them) as inviting Jehoshaphat by his own example, to take the same course, wherein he prevailed.

§. II.

Probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old King Jehoshaphat to change his purpose of sin, in making his son Jehoram King.

Many arguments do very strongly prove Jehoram to have been wholly overruled by his wife, especially for his forsaking the religion of his godly Ancestors, and following the abominable superstitions of the house of Achab.

That she was a woman of intollerable pride, and abhorring to live a private life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vain matter she was able to produce, whereby to make her husband think that his brethren and kindred were but mean and unworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his children, which were begotten upon the daughter and sister of two great Kings, not upon base women, and meer subjects. The Court of Abab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad were matter sufficient to make an insolent man think highly of himself, as being allied to honourably, who could otherwise have found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heir apparent to the Crown, whereof already he had, in a manner, the possession.

How soon his vices brake out, or how long he dissembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be known. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did very soon make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon caused the young man to know himself better, by making him fall back into rank among his younger brethren. And surely the doings of Jehoshaphat about the same time, argue no small distemper of the whole country, through the misgovernment of his ungodly son. For the good King was fain to make his progress round about the Land, reclaiming the people unto the service of God, and appointing Judges throughout all the strong Cities of Juda City by City. This had been a needless labour, if the religion taught & strongly maintained by Asa, and by himself had not suffered alteration, and the course of Justice been perverted, by the power of such as had born authority. But the necessity that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did give to the Judges; and by his commission given to one of the Priests in spiritual causes, and to the Steward of his house in temporal matters, to be generally over-seers.

This was not till after the death of Abaziah the son of Abab; but how long after it is uncertain. For Jehoram the brother of Abaziah began his reign (as hath been already noted) in the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat, which was then accounted the second of Jehoram, Jehoshaphat's son, though afterward this Jehoram of Juda had another first and second year, even in his fathers time, before he reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and Expositors of the holy Text agree. So he continued in private estate, until the two and twentieth of his fathers reign, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignity are not set down, yet we may not think, that motives thereto, appearing substantial, were wanting. Jehoram of Israel held the same correspondence with with Jehoshaphat that his father had done; and made use of it. He drew the Judeans into the war of Moab, at which time it might well be, that the young Prince of Juda was again ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition he had been. Or if we ought rather to think, that the preparations for the enterprize against Moab did not occupy so much time, as from the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat, in which year that Nation rebelled against Israel, unto his two and twentieth; yet the daily negotiations between the two Kings of Juda and Israel, and the affinity between them contracted in the person of Jehoram, might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certain how the behaviour of the younger sons, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their father to put him in possession for fear of tumult after his death; or the deep dissimulation of Jehoram himself might win the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing usual in mischievous fell natures, to be as subject and servile in time of adversity, as insolent and bloody upon advantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his former estate, he demeaned himself in such wise toward his brethren, as caused their father to enable them, not only with store of silver and gold, and of precious things, (which kind of liberality other Kings doubtless had used unto their younger sons) but with the custody of strong Cities in Juda, to assure them, if it might have been, by unwonted means, against unwonted perils.

§. III.

The doings of Jehoram when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

But all this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwise determined of the sequel. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the younger sons of Jehoshaphat found strong Cities, a weak defence, against the power of him unto whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in upon the summons of a King their brother, then had he them without any more ado; if they stood upon their guard, then were they Traytors, and so unable to hold out against him, who besides his own power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish Kingdom against them; so that the apparent likelihood of their final overthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoever it was,

they were all taken and slain, and with them for company many great men of the Land, such belike as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant sought their lives, or had been appointed Rulers of the Country, when Jehoram was deposed from his government; in which office they, without forbearing to do justice, could hardly avoid the doing of many things derogatory to their young Master; which if he would now call treason, saying that he was then King, who durst say the contrary?

After this Jehoram took upon him, as being now Lord alone to make invasions in Religion, wherein he was not contented, as other Idolatrous Princes, to give way and safe conduct unto Superstition and Idolatry, nor to provoke and encourage the people to that sin, whereto it is wonderful that they were so much addicted, having such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that above all other sins; but he used compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registred, to have set up Irreligion by force.

Whilst he was thus busied at home, in doing what he listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and having hitherto since David's time, been governed by a Vice-Roy, did now make unto themselves a King. Against these Jehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots; with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the Rebels to fly into their places of advantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom he should have subdued, and kept his servants. Now began the prophecy of Isaac to take effect, wherein he foretold, that Esaus in process of time should break the yoke of Jacob. For after this the Edomites could never be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Juda, but held their own so well, that when, after many civil and foreign wars, the Jews by sundry Nations had been brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his son, and others of that race following him, became Lords of the Jews, in the decrepit age of Israel, and reigned as Kings, even in Jerusalem it self.

The freedom of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great City within Juda, which in the time of Joshua had a peculiar King, to rebel against Jehoram, and set it self in liberty. Libna stood in the confines of Benjamin and of Dan, far from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therefore so unlike ly it was to have maintained it self in liberty, that it may seem strange how it could escape from utter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have been taken, by their powerful, cruel, and thoroughly incensed Lord. The Israelites held such good intelligence at that time with Juda, that he would not have accepted the Town, had it offered it self unto him: neither do we read that it sought how to cast it self into a new subjection, but continued a free state. The rebellion of it against Jehoram, was, because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to have not only been the first and remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason, moving the inhabitants to do as they did: for it was a Town of the Levites; who must needs be driven into great extremities, when a religion, contrary to Gods Law, had not onely some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsive authority to force unto it all that were unwilling. As for the use of the Temple at Jerusalem (which, being devout men, they might fear to lose by this rebellion) it was never denied to those of the ten revolted Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather invited the Israelites thither, and gave them kind entertainment: under idolaters they must have been without it, whether they lived free, or in subjection. Yet it seems that private reasons were not wanting, which might move them rather to do than suffer that which was unwarrantable. For in the general visitation before remembered, wherein Jehosaphat reformed his kingdom, the good old King appointing new Governours, and giving them especial charge to do justice without respect of persons, used these words; The Levites shall be officers before you; Be of good courage, and do it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seems, that he encouraged them against the more powerful, than just proceedings of his son; whom if the Levites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them, & make them now to feel, as many Princes of the land had done, his heavy indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much as besieged or molested, may justly seem very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Jehosaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to have over-whelmed any one Town, and buried it under the earth, which they might well in one month have cast into it with shovels, by ordinary approach.

But it seems that of those great numbers which his father could have levied, there were not many which Jehoram could well easier lose, to let one Town goe, then to put likely to follow the example of Libna, than Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happiness to be feared than to be loved, are fain themselves to stand in fear of those, by whom they might have been dreadful unto others.

§. IV.
Of the miseries falling upon Jehoram, and of his death.

These afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the mind of the wicked Prince; a Prophecy in writing was delivered to him, which threatened both his people, his children, his wives, and his own body. Hereby likewise it appears that he was a cruel persecutor of Gods servants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his predecessors, both good and evil Kings; but were fain to denounce Gods judgements against him by letters, keeping themselves close and far from him. This Epistle is said to have been sent unto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophesied in his stead before this time, even in the daies of Jehosaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this prophecy in writing behind him, or that (as some conjecture) the error of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we read Elias for Elizeus. Indeed any thing may rather be believed than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Elias from heaven did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, devised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from heaven to St. Giles.

But whosoever was the Author of this threatening Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophecy was as terrible as the sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Judaea, and took the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wives, all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of David, to make any offensive warre till now; and had lost the best of their Towns, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small territories, by defensive arms, to which they were were constrained at Gibbethon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to have been then, as they are now, a naked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their Country affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to rob and spoil in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities, such as were thick set in Juda. True it is, that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then known, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must be considered, that this was when they had learned of the Romans the Art of War; and that the provisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Province, did make them able and skilful in pursuing their conquest, and going on into Regions far removed from them. At this day having lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as live in Arabia it self are good horsemen, but ill appointed; very dangerous to passengers, but unable to deal with good Soldiers, as riding stark naked, and rather trusting in the swiftness of their horses than in any other means of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such, or little better, may they seem to have been, that spoiled Judaea in the time of Jehoram. For their Country was always barren and desart, wanting manual Arts whereby to supply the naturals with furniture: neither are these bands named as chief in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may infer, that one half, yea, or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Juda and Benjamin under Jehosaphat (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eighty thousand fighting men) had been enough to have driven away far greater forces than these enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the people been unable to deal with them, for lack of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes jealousy, as in Saul's time by the policy of the Philistims.

It may seem that the house of the King which these invaders took, was not his Palace in Jerusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Country, where his wives and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we read not that they did sack the City, or spoil the Temple; which would have invited them as a more commodious booty, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they took Jerusalem it self by surprize, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guard too weak to keep them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous: and therefore having done what spoil they could, withdrew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to convey away.

The slaughter committed by Jehu on the two and forty brethren of Abaziah, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers sons, and the cruel massacre wherein all the Royal seed perished (only Josiah excepted) under the tyranny of Abaziah, following within two years after this invasion of the Philistims and Arabians, make it seem probable, that the sons of Jehoram were not all slain at once, but that rather the first murder began in his own time, and was seconded by many other heavy blows, wherewith his house was incessantly stricken, until it was in a manner quite hewed down.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the body of this wicked King, smiting him with a grievous disease in his bowels, which left him not until his guts fell out, and his wretched soul departed from his miserable carcass. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place of burial among his Ancestors the Kings of Juda, though his own son succeeded him in the Kingdom, who was guided by the same spirits that had been his Fathers evil Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous interring of a dead husband. She was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintain her own greatness, to retain her favourites in their authority, and to place about her Son such Counsellors of the house of Abaziah, as were fittest for her turn. Wherefore she thought it unreasonable to make much of the peoples eyes, with a stately funeral of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things pallid be laid upon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her self and hers, which it now did concern her to avoid. Such is the quality of wicked Insigators, having made greedy use of bad employments, to charge, not only with his own vices, but with their faults also, the man whose evil inclinations their sinister counsels have made worse, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Jehoram fell out indeed in a busy time, when his friend and cousin the Israelite, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult War against the Aramites; and therefore could have no better leisure to help Athalia, in setting of things according to her own mind, than he had (perhaps through the same hindrance) to help her husband, when he was distressed by the Philistines; Yea, rather he needed and craved the assistance of the men of Juda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly run thither again, unless they were very fairly intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I have thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as far as the circumstances remembered in holy Scripture would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appear, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the revealed will of God, accomplish nevertheless his hidden purpose, and without miraculous means, confound themselves in the seeming-wise devices of their own folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learn to submit their judgments to the ordinance of God, rather than to think, that they may safely dispense with his commandments, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisdom dictateth unto them. For in such kind of unhappy subtilties, it is manifest that Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Son; but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear, in that which immediately followeth.

§. V.
Of the reign of Ahaziah, and his business with the King of Israel.

Obazias, or Ahazias, the son of Jehoram and Athalia, began his reign over Juda, in the twelfth year of Jehoram the son of Ahab King of Israel, and reigned but one year. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficulty than importance to know it: yet hath it bred much dispute, whereof I see no more probable conclusion than that of Tornelius, alleging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588, which saith that he was twenty years old in the beginning of his kingdom; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that do give him two years more. Like enough he is to have been young: for he was governed by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gave him counsel by which he perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his fathers courses. In matter of State he likewise upheld the league made with the house of Ahab. He was much busied in doing little, and that with ill success. He accompanied his Cousin the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they won, but not without blows: for Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was fain to adventure his own person, which escaped not un wounded.

The Town being won, was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Hazael King of Aram: which done, Jehoram King of Israel withdrew himself to the City of Jezrael, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Ahaziah returned to Jerusalem. It seems that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all scanty one year, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken up a great part) when he did make a new journey, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would have hindered, and therefore sought every occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vain piece of work for to leave his kingdom, having no other business than by way of complement to go see one whom he had seen yesterday. Certain it is, that the Lord had relented at this time to put in execution that heavy judgement, which he had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet upon the house of Ahab. And hereupon at this time had he disposed not onely the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seem to have been accidental, but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing less than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtless was one; whose malicious purposes it will shortly be needful, for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.
How Ahaziah perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Family was destroyed by Jehu.

The whole Army of Israel, with all the principal Captains, lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elzeas the Prophet came in among the Captains that were sitting together; who calling out among them Jehu, a principal man, took him apart, and anointed him King over Israel, rehearsing unto him the Prophecy of Elias against the house of Ahab, and letting him understand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captains a desire to know the errand, which Jehu thought meet meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had over-heard all the talk or no. When he had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forthwith proclaimed him King. For the Prophecy of Elias was well known among them, neither durst any one oppose himself against him, that was by God ordained to perform it.

Jehu, who had upon the sudden this great honour thrown upon him, was not slow to put himself in possession of it, but used the first heat of their affections, who joyed with him, in setting on foot the business which nearly concerned him, and was not to be fore-slowed, being no more his own than Gods.

The first care was that no news of the revolt might be carried to Jezrael, whereby the King might have had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseen, he marched swiftly away to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Jehoram was now so well recovered of his Wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seems that there was much feasting, and joy made, especially by Queen Jezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Ahaziah coming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queen, as to visit the King.

Certain it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did never so much flourish as at this time. Seventy Princes of the bloud Royal there were that lived in Samaria; Jehoram the son of Queen Jezabel had won Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vain, with loss of his life; and he won it by valiant fight, wherein he received wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amity was so great between Israel and Juda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of success to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the prophecy of Elias might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembered, than as an unlikely tale by them that beheld the majestic face of the Court, wherein to great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and forty Princes of his blood expected.

In the midst of this security, whilst these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosecution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebels and enemies; or else were triumphing in joy of that which was already achieved, and the Queen-mother dressing her self in the brave manner to come down amongst them;

tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discovered a company coming. These news were not very troublesome for the Army that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be ready against all attempts of the Aramites; was likely enough to be discharged upon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stir. Onely the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger coming to Jehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the King as little warning as might be. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the King to be satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and he was likewise detained by Jehu. These dumb shows bred some suspicion in Jehoram, whom the Watchman certified of all that happened. And now the company drew so near, that they might, though not perfectly, be discerned, and notice taken of Jehu himself by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discover any weakness, caused his Chariot to be made ready, and issued forth with Ahaziah King of Juda in his company, whose presence added majesty to his train, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee, had been more needful. This could not be done so hastily, but that Jehu was come even to the towns end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Jehoram began to salute Jehu with terms of peace, but receiving a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that crying out upon the treason to his fellow King, he turned away to have fled. But Jehu soon overtook him with an arrow, wherewith he struck him dead, and threw his carcass into that field, which, purchased with the blood of the rightful owner, was to be watered with the blood of the unjust possessor. Neither did Ahaziah escape so well, but that he was arrested by a Wound, which held him till death did seize upon him.

The Kings Palace was joyning to the wall, by the gate of the City, where Jezabel might soon be advertised of this calamity, if she did not with her own eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercy, whose judgment, pronounced against her long before, had overtaken her, when the least expected it. But the full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her self ready in all haste, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious looks to daunt the Traitor, or at least to utter some Apophthegme that should express her brave spirit; spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for ever. Little did he think upon the hungry dogs that were ordained to devour her, whose paunches the stibium, with which she besmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith the armed her tongue could trouble the ears of him that had her in his power. As Jehu drew near, she opened her window, and looking out upon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long enjoyed the fruits of his treason, and murder of the King his Master. This was in meer humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeed a part of miserable folly; as are all things, howsoever laudable, if they have an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her own Eunuchs that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much less was her enemy daunted with her proud spirit. When Jehu saw that she did use the little remainder of her life in seeking to vex him, he made her presently to understand her own estate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her servants to know which of them would be on his side, and soon found them ready to offer their service before the very face of their proud Lady. Hereupon he commanded them to cast her down head-long: which immediately they performed, without all regard of her greatness and estate, wherein the

had a few hours before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the judgments of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her own servants, at the commandment of her greatest enemy, that was yesterday her subject, but now her Lord; and she perished miserably, struggling in vain with base grooms, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilst her insulting enemy late on horse-back, adding indignity to her grief by scornful beholding the shameful manner of her fall, and trampling her body under foot. Her dead carcase that was left without the Walls, was devoured by dogs, and her very memory was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatry, murder, and oppression, with slow, but sure payment, and full interest.

Abazia King of Juda fleeing a-pace from Jehu, was overtaken by the way where he lurked; and receiving his deadly Wound in the Kingdom of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and seek his burial in his own Kingdom: and this favour he obtained for his Grand-fathers sake, not for his Fathers nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Jerusalem, where he was entered with his Ancestors, having reigned about one year.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia; and whose son he was that succeeded her.

Of Athalia's usurping the Kingdom, and what pretences she might force.

After the death of Abazia, it is said that his house was not able to retain the Kingdom: which Note, and the proceedings of Athalia upon the death of her son, have given occasion to divers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Joas, who reigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispossessed of her son, upon whose name she had ruled at her pleasure, did forthwith lay hold upon all the Princes of the blood, and slew them, that so she might occupy the Royal Throne her self, and reign as Queen, rather than live a Subject. She had before-hand put into great place, and made Counsellors unto her son, such as were fittest for her purpose, and ready at all times to execute her will: that she kept a strong guard about her, it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Jehoram, upon the Princes, and many of the Nobility, had made the people tame, and fearful to stir, whatsoever they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soever it be, is seldom or never so shameless as to refuse the commodity of goodly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serve to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for us to think, that Athalia, when she saw the Princes of the Royal blood, all of them in a manner slain by her husband, and afterwards his own children destroyed by the Philistines, began even then to play her own game, reducing by artificial practice, into fair likelihoods, those possibilities wherewith her husband bands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great view of reason, either by her own mouth, or by some trusty creature of hers might she give him to understand, how needful it were to take the best order whilst as yet he might, for fear of the worst that might happen. If the issue of David, which now remained only in his family, should by any accident fail (as wofull experience had already shewed what might after come to pass) the people of Juda were not unlikely to choose a King of some new stock, a popular seditious man peradventure, one that to countenance his own unworthiness, would not care what aspersions he laid upon that Royal house, which was fallen down. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contrive the destruction of him, and all his seed? Wherefore it were the wisest way to design by his authority, not only his successor, but also the reversioner, and so to provide, that the Crown might never be subject to any rising, but remain in the disposition of them that loved him best, if the worst that might be feared coming to pass, his own posterity could not retain it.

Such persuasions being urged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that governed his affections, were able to make the jealous Tyrant think, that the only way to frustrate all devices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her heir the last and youngest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queen's Mother, to uphold the first and eldest.

If Athalia took no such course as this in her husband's time, yet might she do it in her sons. For Abazia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his mother) was not likely to take much care for the security of his half-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wives, in respect of his own-born-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children basely forgotten. But if this mischievous woman forgot her self so far in her wicked policy, that she lost all opportunity which the weakness of her husband and son did afford, of procuring unto her self some seeming Title; yet could she afterwards feign some such matter, as boldly she might: being sure that none would ask to see her evidence, for fear of being sent to learn the certainty of her son or husband in another World. But I rather think that she took order for her affairs before-hand. For though she had no reason to suspect or fear the sudden death of her son, yet it was the wisest way to provide betimes against all that might happen, whilst her husband's issue by other women was young and unable to resist. We plainly find that the Brethren or Nephews of Abazia, to the number of two and forty, were sent to the Court of Israel, only to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queen. The slender occasion of which long journey, considered together with the quality of these persons (being in effect all the stock of Jehoram that could be grown to any strength) makes it very suspicious, that their entertainment in Jehazels house would only have been more formal, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Jehu. He that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queens, will find cause enough to think no less. Of such as have aspired unto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heirs by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validity than the sword of such as claimed by them could give, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentiful examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing wherof one may say, Behold, this is new? It hath been al- Eccles. i. 10 ready in the old time that was before us. That a King might shed his brothers blood, was proved by Salomon upon Adonia; that he might alien the Crown from his natural Heirs, David had given proof; but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willing by shewing what they may do, than acknowledging why Salomon slew his brother that had begun one rebellion, and was entering into another. Jer. 34 *horam slew all his brethren, which were better than he: David purchased the Kingdom, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed: if Jehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that he might alien the remainder at his pleasure; or if Abazia fought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue; either of these was to be answered with the words which Jehojada the Priest used afterwards, in declaring the title of Joash: Behold, the Kings son must reign; as the Lord hath said of the son of David. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoever it might be, to the Crown of Juda; yet it is most certain that she had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treachery, murder, and open violence, and so she held it six whole years, and a part of the seventh, in good seeming security.*

§. II.

How Jehu spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest Athalia.

IN all this time Jehu did never goe about to disturb her; which in reason he was likely to desire, being an enemy to her whole House. But he was occupied at the first in establishing himself, rooting out the posterity of Abah, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in wars against the Aramites, wherein he was so far overcharged, that hardly he could retain his own, much less attempt upon others. Of the line of Abah there were seventy living in Samarra, out of which number Jehu by letter advised the Citizens to set up some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was; which they well understood to proceed from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they took example by the two Kings whom he had slain, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their service; wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in less than one daies warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were enjoyed by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtilty, feigning a great sacrifice to their god, by which means he drew them all together into one Temple, where he slew them: and in the same zeal to God utterly demolished all the monuments of that impiety.

Concerning the Idolatry devised by Jeroboam, no King of Israel had ever greater reason than Jehu to destroy it. For he needed not to fear lest the people should be allured unto the house of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted up, and the Crown of Juda in the possession of a cruel Tyranness; he had received his kingdom by the unexpected grace of God; and further in regard of his zeal exprest in destroying Baal out of Israel, he was promised notwithstanding his following the sin of Jeroboam, that the kingdom should remain in his Family to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serve; he would needs help to piece out Gods providence with his own circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedy gamester, who by stealing a needles Card to assure himself of winning a stake, forfeits his whole t. st. He had questionless displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the use of superstition, so long practised as was that Idolatry of Jeroboam. Yet all these, how many soever they were, had never once thought upon making him King, if God, whom (to retain them) he now forsook, had not given him the Crown, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

This ingratitude of Jehu drew terrible vengeance of God upon Israel, whereof Hazael King of Damascus was the executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we may find in the Prophecy of Elisha, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shall thou set on fire, and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their Infants against the stones, and rend in pieces their women with child. So did not only the wickedness of Abah cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatry of the people bring a lamentable misery upon all the Land. For the fury of Hazaels victory was not quenched with the destruction of a few towns, nor wearied with one invasion; but he smote them in all the coast of Israel, and wasted all the Country beyond the River of Jordan.^{2 King. 10. 12.} Notwithstanding all these calamities, it seems that the people repented not of their Idolatry; (For in those daies the Lord began to visit Israel) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble house of Abah, under which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, & had bravely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were faine to make woful shifts, living under a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruel enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can find all manner of difficulties in serving him; to whom nothing is difficult, are, in stead of the ease & the pleasure to themselves propounded by contrary courses, overwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to avoid; and therein by God, whom they first forsook, forsaken, and left unto the wretched labours of their own blind wilidom, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

§. III.

Of Athaliahs Government.

THESE calamities falling upon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giving her leisure to look to things at home: as having little little to do abroad, unless it were so that she held some correspondency with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her Husbands Grand-father King Aza, who had done the like. And some probability that the did so, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For we find, that this wicked Athalia and her children brake up the house of God, and all things that were dedicated for the house of the Lord did they bestow upon Baalim. Such a sacrilege, though it proceeded from a desire to let out her own Idolatry, with such pomp as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some fair pretext of necessity of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successor was faine to do the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taste of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Under this impious government of Athalia, the devotion of the Priests and Levites was very notable, and served (no doubt) very much to retain the people in the Religion taught by God himself, howsoever the Queens proceedings advanced the contrary. For the poverty of that sacred Tribe of Levi must needs have been exceeding great at this time, all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being utterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they lived, being now very few and small; and the store, laid up in better times under godly Kings, being all taken away by shameful robbery. Yet they up-held in all this misery the service of God, and the daily sacrifice keeping daily their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no less than in those daies wherein their entertainment was far better.

§. IV.

Of the preservation of Joas.

Jehojada then occupied the high Priesthood, an honourable, wife, and religious man. To his carefulness it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some slender sort up-held in those unhappy times. His Wife was Jehoshabet, who was daughter of King Jehoram, and sister to Athalia, a godly Lady and vertuous, whose piety makes it seem that Athalia was not her Mother, though her access to the Court argue the contrary: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her own Fathers house, than the education under such a Mother could have permitted her to be such as she was. By her care Joash the young Prince that reigned soon after, was conveyed out of the nursery, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, where as secretly he was brought up. How it came to pass that this young child was not hunted out, when his body was missing; nor any great reckoning (for ought that we find) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was not good in policy, that the people should hear say, that one of the children had avoyded that cruel blow; it might have made them hearken after innovations, and so be the less conformable to their present government. So Joash was delivered out of that slaughter; he and his nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peradventure to be cast away, as having no other guard than a poor Woman that gave him suck, who foolishly doubting that the her self should have been slain, was fled away with him into some desolate place, whereto was like enough that she and he should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily coin such tales, and rather swear them to be true in their own knowledge, than they will lose the thanks due to their joyful tidings.

§. V.

Whose Son Joas was.

§. I.

Whether Joas may be thought likely to have been the Son of Ahaziah.

NOW concerning this Joash, whose son he was, it is a thing of much difficulty to affirm, and hath caused much controvercie among Writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the son of Ahaziah, seem plain enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might give title of Son unto him, in regard that he was his Successour, I neither by my self can find, nor can by any help of Authors learn how to answer the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that think him to have been, or not, the natural son of Ahaziah. For whereas it is said, that the house of Ahaziah was not able to retain the Kingdom; some do inferre that this Joash was not properly called his son, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as son in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For the perceiving that the Kingdom was to fall into their hands, in whom the had no interest, might easily find cause to fear, that the tyranny exercised by her husband at her instigation upon so many noble Houses, would now be revenged upon her self. The ruin of her Idolatrous Religion might in this case terrify both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedy of Jezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queen. All this had little concerned her, if her own grand-child had been heir to the Crown; for she that had power enough to make her self Queen, could with more ease, and less envy, have taken upon her the office of a Protector, by which authority she might have done her pleasure, and been the more both obeyed by others, and secure of her own estate, as not wanting an heir. Wherefore it was not needful, that she should be so unnatural, as to destroy the Child of her own Son, of whose life she might have made greater use than she could of his death: whereas indeed, the love of Grandmothers to their Nephews, is little less than the Mothers to their Children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seem incredible, that all natural affection should be cast aside, when as neither necessity urgeth, nor any commodity thereby gotten requireth it, yea, when all humane policy doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would have perswaded.

¶ II.

That Joas did not descend from Nathan.

BUT (as it is more easy to find a difficulty in that which is related, than to shew how it might have otherwise been) the pedigree of this Joash is, by them which think him not the son of Ahaziah, set down in such sort, that it may very justly be suspected. They say, that he descended from Nathan the son of David, and not from Salomon: to which purpose they bring a History (I know whence) of two Families of the race of David, saying, that the line of Salomon held the Kingdom with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the Family of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathan the son of David, there are that would have him to be Nathan the Prophet, who, as they think, was by David adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward he revoked it, as was meet; for this Nathan is reckoned among the sons of David, by Bathshua the daughter of Amnes, and therefore could not be the Prophet.

Gregory Nazianzen (as I find him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him Erasmus, and Faber Stapulentis, have likewise held the fame of Joash, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan and those other brethren of Salomon by the same Mother, are thought, upon good likelihoods to have been the children of Oriah the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundry of the Fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulenst, who follow the Hebrew Expolitors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himself the only begotten of his mother, do approve this exposition: for we read of no more than two sons which Bathshua or Bathsheba did bear unto David, whereof the one begotten in adultery, died an Infant, and Salomon only of her children by the King did live. So that the rest must needs have been the children of Oriah, and are thought to have been David's only by adoption. Wherefore if Joas had not been the son of Ahaziah, then must that pedigree have been false, wherein S. Matthew deriveth him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Saviour issued from the loins of David, according to the flesh, but had only been of his line by courtesy of the Nation, and form of law, as any other might have been. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawn many late Writers into the opinion that Joash was not of the posterity of Salomon, it is enough to say, that this was Frier Annus his Philo: for no other edition of Philo, hath any such matter; but Annus can make Authors to speak what he list.

¶ III.

That Joas may probably be thought to have been the son of Jehoram.

IN so doubtful a case, if it seem lawful to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought upon, me thinks it were not amiss to open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickedness of Jehoram the son of Jehosaphat King of Juda, for which he and his children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of David, that according to his promise he would give him a light, and to his children for ever: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Jehoram, there was not a son left him, save Jehoahaz the youngest of his sons. Now if it were in regard of Gods promise to David, that after those massacres of Jehoram upon all his brethren, and of the Philistines and Arabians upon the children of Jehoram, one of the seed of David escaped; why may it not be thought that he was said to have escaped in whom the line of David was preserved? for had all the race of Salomon been rooted up in these woful Tragedies, and the progeny of Nathan succeeded in place thereof; like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would have been extant, of an event so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord, as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preservation of the house of David, mentioned in the Books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Jehoahaz, in whom the Royal branch of Salomon, the natural, and not only legal issue remaining of David, was kept alive. Wherefore it may be thought that this Joash, who followed Athalia in the Kingdom, was the youngest son of Jehoram, whose life Athalia, as a step-dame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not easily understood, why the preservation of David's line, by Gods especial mercy, in regard of his promise made, should pertain rather to that time, when besides Athalia himself, there were two and forty of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sons of his brethren remaining alive, which afterwards were all slain by Jehu; than have reference to the lamentable destruction and little less than extirpation of that progeny, wherein one only did escape. Certainly that inhuman murder which Jehoram committed upon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the History) revenged upon his own children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistines and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Jehu, and finally took effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation he had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heavy judgment laid upon Jehoram and all his children, only Jehoahaz his youngest son was exempted; whom therefore if I should affirm to be the same with Joas, which is called the son of Ahaziah, I should not want good probability. Some further appearance of necessity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise have been. For it was the youngest son of Jehoram in whom the race was preserved; which could not in any likelihood be Ahaziah, seeing that he was twenty years old at the least (as is already noted) when he began to reign, and consequently, was born in the eighteenth or twentieth year of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more unlikely, either that Jehoram should have begotten many children before he was eight-teen years old, or that having (as he had) many wives and children, he should upon the sudden, at his eighteenth year, become unfruitful, and beget no more in twenty years following; each of which must have bin true, if this were true that Ahaziah was the same Jehoahaz which was his youngest son. But this inconvenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causeless cruelty of Athalia, in seeking the life of Joas are easily cleared, if Joas and Jehoahaz were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion; For he was seven years old when he began to reign; which if we understand of years complete, he might have been a year old at the death of Jehoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sickness. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the natural son of Jehoram, though called the son of Ahaziah, than it were to say, as great Authors have done, this difficulty notwithstanding, that he was of the posterity of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer, which had it concurred with the rest, might have served as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoahaz, that soundeth much more near to Joas, than to Ahaziah, in an English ear, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilful in that language) through the diversity of certain letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our Western manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that Ahaziah himself be also called Azaria, and must have had three names, if he were the same with Jehoahaz; in which manner Joas might also have had several names; yet, because I find no other warrant hereof than a bare possibility, I will not presume to build an opinion upon the weak foundation of mine own conjecture, but leave all to the consideration of such as have more ability to judge, and leisure to consider of this point.

¶ IV.

Upon what reasons Athalia might seek to destroy Joas, if he were her own Grandchild.

IF therefore we shall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be said, that Athalia was not only blinded by the passions of ambition and zeal to her Idolatrous worship of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some unnatural desires, in seeking the destruction of her grand-child, and the rest of the blood Royal. For whether ther it were so that Athalie (as proud and cruel Women are not always chaste) had imitated the liberty of Jezabel her sister in law, whose Whoredoms were upbraided by Jehu to her son; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married unto Jehoram (which is not unlikely, in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahab) certain it is that she had sons of her own, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondered at, that to settle the Crown upon her own children, she did seek to cut off, by wicked policy, all other claims. As for Joas, if he were his Grand-mother, yet she might mistrust the interest which his mother would have in him, lest when he came to years, it might draw him from her devotion. And hereof (besides that Women do commonly better love their daughters Husbands, than their sons Wives) there is some appearance in the reign of her son; for she made him spend all his time in idle journeys, to no other apparent end, than that she might rule at home; and he living abroad be estranged from his Wife, and entertain some new fancies, wherein Jezabel had cunning enough to be his Tutors. But when the sword of Jehu had rudely cut in sunder all these fine devices, then was Athalie fain to go roundly to work, and do as she did, whereby she thought to make all sure. otherwise, if (as I could rather think) she were only stepdame to Joas, we need not seek into the reasons moving her to take away his life; her own hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

§. VI.

A digression, wherein is maintained the liberty of using conjecture in Histories.

THus much concerning the person of Joas, from whence, as from a new root, the tree of David was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this History, and the diversity between it and others, the less me thinks I need to suspect mine own presumption, as deserving blame, for curiosity in matter of doubt, or boldness in liberty of conjecture. For all Histories do give us information of humane counsels and events, as far forth as the knowledge and faith of the Writers can afford; but of Gods Will, by which all things are ordered, they speak only at random, and many times fallily. This we often find in profane Writers, who attribute the ill success of great undertakings, to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the less wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Jewes in Egypt unto Jeremy the Prophet reprehending their Idolatry. For howsoever the written Law of God was known unto the people, and his punishments laid upon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and even then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent unto their Wils, that they would not by any means be drawn to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queen of heaven, as they and their Fathers, their Kings and their Princes had used to do: For then (said they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no evil: adding, that all manner of miseries were befallen them, since they left off that service of the Queen of Heaven. So blind is the wisdom of man, in looking into the counsel of God, which to find out, there is no better nor other guide than his own written Will not perverted by vain additions.

But this History of the Kings of Israel and Juda hath herein a singular prerogative above all that have been written by the most sufficient of merely humane Authors: it setteth down expressly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his over-frowardness in battle; the ruine of his Family, to the security of Jehoram in Jezreel; nor the Victories of Elihu, to the great commotions raised in Israel by the coming of Jehu; but referring all unto the Will of God, I mean, to his revealed Will, from which that his hidden purposes do not vary, this Story, by many great examples, gives most notable proof. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these Books nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir Philip Sidney, that Historians do borrow of Poets, not only much of their Ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, records not always true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discover the passions which do set them first on foot. Wherefore they are fain (I speak of the best, and in that which is allowed; for to take out of Livy every one circumstance of Claudius his journey against Astruculus in Italy, fitting all to another business, ness, or any practice of that kind, is neither Historical, nor Poetical) to search into the particular humour of Princes, and of those which have governed their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought; from whence they do collect the most likely motives or impediments of every business; and so figuring as near to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they judiciously consider the defects in counsel, or obliquity in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to give assurance, howsoever it may give satisfaction. For the heart of man is unsearchable: and Princes, howsoever their intents be seldom hidden from some of those many eyes which pry both into them, and into such as live about them; yet sometimes either by their own close temper, or by some subtilties, they conceal the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the afflictions themselves lye dead, and buried in oblivion, when the preparations which they begat, are converted to another use. The industry of an Historian, having to many things to weary it, may well be excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions work to the same end, that one small matter in a weak mind is more effectual, than many that seem far greater. So comes it many times to pass, that great fires, which consume whole houses or towns, begin with a few straws, that are wasted or not seen; when the flame is discovered, having fastened upon some Wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionless it is, that the War commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greeks, proceeded from desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: howsoever the enterprise of the Athenians upon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrel; yet Herodotus telleth us, that the wanton desire of Queen Atossa, to have the Grecian dames her bond-women, did first move Darius to prepare for this War before he had received any injury, and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more justly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alledging the vain appetite, and secret speech of the Queen in bed with her Husband, as the cause of those great evils following; this I may boldly affirm (having, I think, in every estate some sufficient witness) that matters of much consequence, founded in all seeming upon substantial reasons, have issued indeed from such petty trifles, as no Historian would either think upon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope, made to a certain Frier, coming to visit him in his Popedom, as having long before in his meaner estate, been his familiar friend. This poor Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to use his old liberty of speech, adventured to tell him, that he very much wondered how it was possible for his Holiness, whom he rather took for a direct honest man, than any cunning Politician, to attain unto the Papacy; in compassing of which, all the subtilty (said he) of the most crafty brains, find work enough: and therefore the more I think upon the Art of the Conclave, and your unaptness thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfy the plain dealing Frier, dealt with him again as plainly, saying, Hadst thou lived abroad as I have done, and seen by what folly this world is governed, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred unto those exorbitant Engines, by which the course of affairs is moved, the Pope said true. For the wisest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutual toleration, work more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needs or can. But if we lift up our thoughts to that supreme Governour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Jupiter.

Pentostum, & urbes, regnaque tristitia,
Divosque mortalesque iurmas, Imperio regit unus equo.*

Who rules the duller Earth, the Wind-sworn streams,
The civil Cities, and th' infernal Realms,
Who th' Host of Heaven, and the mortal Band,
Alone doth govern by his just command.

Then shall we find the quite contrary. In him there is no uncertainty nor change; he foreseeth all things, and all things disposed to his own honour; He neither deceiveth nor can be deceived, but continuing one and the same for ever, doth constantly govern all creatures by that Law, which he hath prescribed, and will never alter. The vanities of men beguile their vain contrivers, and the prosperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad broad and headlong passage to hell, is not so delightful as it seems at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poisons which infect the soul, many cruel thorns deeply wounding the body; all which if any few escape, they have onely this miserable advantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the service of God is the path guiding us to perfect happiness, and hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yielding such abundance of joy to the conscience, as doth easily countervail all afflictions whatsoever; though indeed those brambles that sometimes tear the skin of such as walk in this blessed way, do commonly lay hold upon them at such time as they sit down to take their ease, and make them with themselves at their journey's end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serve, in whose presence is the fulness of joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for ever.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to reach by example of times past, such Wisdom as may guide our desires and actions, we should not marvel though the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct us chiefly, in that which is most requisite for us to know; as the means to attain unto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by some Prophet after the captivity: we may well believe that the counsel of God therein, and the executors of his righteous Will, should have occupied either the whole or the principal room in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, and the business at Sardes, with other occurrences, been the less true, though they might have been omitted, as the less material: but these things it had been lawful for any man to gather out of prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not have done injury to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forbore to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the business that I have now in hand: wherein I cannot believe that any man of judgment will tax me, as either fabulous or presumptuous. For he doth not feign, that rehearseth probabilities as bare conjectures; neither doth he deprave the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things which authority alone, without further circumstance, ought to have confirmed in every mans belief. And this may suffice in defence of the liberty which I have used in conjectures, and may hereafter use when occasion shall require, as neither unlawful, nor mis-bebecoming anti-fistorian.

The conspiracy against Athalia.

When Athalia had now six years and longer worn the Crown of Juda, and had found neither any foreign enemy, nor domestical adversary to disturb her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickedness meeting together, took her away without any warning, by a violent and shameful death. For the growth of the young Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very unfitting that his education should be simple, to make him seem the child of some poor man (as for his safety it was requisite) when his capacity required to have been induced with the stomach and qualities meet for a King. All this Jehojada the Priest considered, and withal, the great increase of impiety, which taking deep root in the Court, was likely to spread it self over all the Country, if care were not used to weed it up very speedily. Wherefore he associated unto himself five of the Captains, in whose fidelity he had best assurance; and having taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings son, he made a Covenant with them, to advance him to the Kingdom. These drew in others of the principal men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely that they should repair to Jerusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many persuasions to win them to the business: the promise of the Lord unto the house of David, was enough to assure them that the action was both lawful, and likely to succeed as they desired.

But in compassing their intent, some difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captains, and other associates of Jehojada able by close working, to draw together so many trusty and serviceable hands as would suffice to manage the business. To help in this case, the Priest gave order to such of the Levites as had finished their courses in waiting on the Divine service at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turns, that they should not depart until they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new comers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noise, made up such a number, as would be able to deal with the Queens ordinary Guard, and that was enough: for if the Tyranness did not prevail against them at the first brunt, the favour of the People was like to shew it self on their side, who made head against her. These Levites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captains, and other adherents, were bestowed in the outer Courts: As for Weapons, the Temple it self had store enough; King David had left an Armory to the place, which was now employed in defence of his issue.

All things being in a readiness, and the day come, wherein this high design was to be put in execution; Jehojada delivered unto the Captains, Armour for them and their adherents, appointed a guard unto the Kings person, produced him openly, and gave unto him the Crown; using all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings, the Queen was the last that heard any word. Which is not so strange as it may seem: for insolent natures, by dealing outrageously with such as bring them ill tidings, do commonly lose the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilst yet it may be prevented, and have no information of danger, till their own eyes, amazed with the suddenness, behold it in the shape of inevitable mischief.

All Jerusalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with the very good liking. Some carried home the news, others ran forth to see, and the common joy was so great, that without apprehension of peril, under the windows of the Court, were the people running and praising the King. Athalia hearing, and beholding the extraordinary concourse, and noise of folks in the streets, making towards the Temple, with much unusual passion in their looks, did presently conceive, that somewhat worthy of her care was happened; though, what it might be, she did not apprehend. Howsoever it were, she meant to use her own wisdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may be, that she thought it some especial solemnity used in the Divine service, which caused this much ado; and hereof the unaccustomed number of Levites, and of other devout men, about the town, might give some presumption.

Many things argue that she little thought upon her own Tragedy; although Jehojada would make it seem otherwise. For we find in the Text, she came to the people into the house of the Lord (which was near to her Palace) and that when she looked and saw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was with the Princes, or great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him, she rent her cloaths, and cryed Treason, Treason. Hereby it appears that she was quietly going, without any mistrust or fear, to take her place; which when she found occupied by another, then she began to afflict her self, as one cast away, and cried out in vain upon the Treason, whereby she saw that she must perish. But that she came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Jehojada reporteth) and that her company being beaten back, she entered alone, and commanded the people to kill the young Tyrant, I find no where in Scripture, neither do I hold it credible. For had the truly known how things went, she would surely have gathered her friends about her, and used those forces in defence of her Crown, by which she gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly, if it were granted, that she, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troop, yet it had been meer madness in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if she, perceiving that neither her authority, nor their own weapons, could prevail to let in her guard, would nevertheless take upon her to command the death of the new King, calling a child of seven years old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom she saw to be armed in his defence, may we not think that she was mad in the most extreme degree? Certain it is that the counsel of God would have taken effect, in her destruction, had she used the most likely means to disappoint it: yet we need not so cut her throat with any moral impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeal of Jehojada found more easie success, through her indiscretion, than otherwise could have been expected; so that at his appointment, she was without more ado, carried out of the Temple and slain, yea so, that no blood, save her own, was shed in that quarrel; her small train that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

The death of Athalia, with a comparison of her and Jezabel.

MOST like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashness of her Nephew Jehoram the Israelite, who did foolishly cast himself into the very throat of danger, gaping upon him, onely through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet his her self, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived such a life as Jezabel had done, was rewarded with a suitable death. These two Queens were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her Husband; was an Idolatress and a Murderess. The onely difference appearing in their condition, is, that Jezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious; So that each of them surviving her Husband about eight years, did spend their time in satisfying her own affections; the one using tyranny, as the exercise of her haughty mind; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her unchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seem in this world to pertain unto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the sudden by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming upon the Treason, received sentence from the mouth of one that had lived under her subjection; in execution whereof, Jezabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies, hories; Athalia slain at her own horse-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more leisure to vex her proud heart; that of Jezabel the more indignity, and shame of body. Touching their burial, Jezabel was devoured by Dogs, as the Lord had threatened by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia we do not find. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as having not persecuted and slain the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her burial there is no monument, for she was a Church-robber. The service of Baal erected by these two Queens, was destroyed as soon as they were gone, and their Chaplains, the Priests of that Religion, slain. Herein also it came to pass, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who slew them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seems to have been her good friend) pretended her revenge, as any part of his quarrel to Juda. Concerning children, all belonging to Jezabel perished in few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behind her, it is uncertain; she had sons living after she was Queen, of whom, or of any other, that they were slain with her, we do not find.

This is a matter not unworthy of consideration, in regard of much that may depend upon it. For if the children of Athalia had been in Jerusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely have followed hers as nearly, and been registred, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbade that the children should die for the fathers, could not have saved these ungracious limps, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that every man should die for his own sin. Seeing therefore that they had been professors and advancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoil of it; likely it is, that they should not have escaped with life, if Jehojada the Priest could have gotten them into his hands. As there was lawful cause enough requiring their death, so the security of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craved as much, and that very earnestly. For these had been esteemed as heirs of their mothers Crown, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular business of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes, and fellows with their Mother in the Kingdom. Therefore it is evident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his Wars against Jehoi) absent from Jerusalem; whereby Jehojada might, with the more confidence, adventure to take Arms against their Mother, that was desolate.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Joas and Amasia, with their Contemporaries; where somewhat of the building of Carthage.

Of Joas his doings, whilst Jehojada the Priest lived.

BY the death of Athalia, the whole Country of Juda was filled with great joy and quietness; wherein Joas, a child of seven years old, or thereabout, began his reign, which continued almost forty years. During his minority, he lived under the protection of that honourable man Jehojada the Priest, who did as faithfully govern the Kingdom, as he had before carefully preserved the Kings life, and restored him unto the Throne of his ancestors. When he came to mans estate, he took by appointment of Jehojada two Wives, and begat Sons and Daughters, repairing the Family of David which was almost worn out. The first Act that he took in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needful piece of work, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wickedness of ungodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should uphold the Temple, whom the Temple had upheld. This business he followed with so earnest a zeal, that not only the Levites were more slack than he, but even Jehojada was fain to be quickened by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the work; partly out of the tax imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberality of the people; who gave so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and silver; and with all other Utensils. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as under godly Kings they had been, and the service of God was magnificently celebrated.

well deserved, having preserved the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little of rooting up themselves, and all their issue. Yet this honourable Funeral seems to have been given to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the City of David, As for the King himself, who did owe to him no less than his Crown and life, he is not likely to have been Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby been discharged of some heavy debt.

For after the death of Jehojada, when the Princes of Juda began to flatter their King, he soon forgot, not only the benefits received by this worthy man his old Counsellor; but also the good precepts which he had received from him, yea and God himself, the Author of all goodness. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Jehoram and Athalia had so infected the Country, in fifteen or sixteen years, that thirty years, or thereabout, of the reign of Joas, wherein the true Religion was exercised; were not able to clear it from that mischief: The King himself, when once he was entered into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his liberty, to despise the service of God; and a manifest proof of his being now King indeed, that he regarded no longer the former admonitions of devout Priests. Hereby it appears, that his former zeal was only counterfeited, wherein like an Actor upon the stage, he had striven to express much more lively affection, than they could shew, that were indeed religious.

§. II.

The Death of Jehojada, and Apostasy of Joas.

BUT this endured no longer than the life of Jehojada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirty years, dyed before his Country could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Juda; as he

BUT God, from whom he was broken loose, gave him over into the hands of men;

men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Town of the Philistines, addressed himself towards Jerusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich booty, did invite him. He had an Army heartened by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the war (if his ambition cared for pretexts) it was enough that the Kings of Juda had afflicted the Israelites in their enterprises upon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I think he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdom of Juda had molested the Aramites in the time of his predecessor, this was thoroughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leaving the ten Tribes in their extrem misery, to the fury of Hazael himself. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dog, and stir up against himself a powerful enemy, before he had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay between Jerusalem and his own Kingdom, if some opportunity had not performed such ease and good success, as might rather advance, than any way disturb his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sons of Abathia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries usually do) to draw many partakers of their own to his side; and not to remain, as Joas did, a neutral in the war between him and Israel, but to join all their forces with his, as they had done, for the rooting out of Jehu his posterity, who like a bloody Traitor, had utterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queens, their mother, even the whole house of Abah, to which he was a subject. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparent reason to invade the Kingdom of Juda. Howsoever we find, that Joas was afraid of him, and therefore took all the hollowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasure of the house of the Lord, or in his own house, with which present he redeemed his peace: the Syrians (questionless) thinking it a better bargain, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the assurance of this for the possibility of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich booty of unhappy treasure, which belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the grave. For in the thirty seventh year of Joas, which was the fiftieth of Jeboabaz, he made this purchase; but in the same or very next year he died, leaving all that he had unto his son Zebedad, with whom these treasures prospered no otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazael, is, by some, confounded with that war of the Aramites upon Juda, mentioned in the second book of Chronicles. But the reasons alleged by them that hold the contrary opinion, do forcibly prove, that it was not all one war. For the former was compounded without blood-shed or fight; in the latter, Joas tried the fortune of a battle, wherein being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life. In the one Hazael himself was present; in the other, he was not named: but contrarywise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seem to have been the son of Hazael) is said to have been at Damascus. The first Army came to conquer, and was so great, that it terrified the King of Juda; the second was a small company of men, which did animate Joas (in vain, for God was against him) to deal with them, as having a very great Army.

Now, concerning the time of this former invasion, I cannot perceive that God forsook him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who think that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Jeboabaz the Priest, because that story is joined to the restoration of the Temple. It had been probable, if the death of Jeboabaz had been afterwards mentioned in that place of the second book of Kings; or if the Apostasy of Joas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his own will and pleasure; neither was he more unjust in the afflictions of Joas that righteous man, or the death of Jeboabaz that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid upon Pharaoh, or his judgement upon the house of Abah. But it appears plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent service of God therein, which are joined together, were used in the house of the Lord continually all the days of Jeboabaz; soon after whose death, if not immediately upon it, that is, (as some very learnedly collect) in the fixt, or thirty seventh year of this Joas his reign, the King falling away from the God of his Fathers, became a foul Idolater.

And indeed we commonly observe, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay upon his servants without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, have always tended unto the bettering of their good. In which respect, even the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his saints being being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great advantage. But with evil and rebellious men, God keepeth a more even and strict account; permitting usually their faults to get the start of their punishment; and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amerites) till their wickedness be full; or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to run on in their wicked courses, to their greater misery. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appears that he dealt with Joas. For this unhappy man did not only continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetful of God and all goodness, as if he had stroven to exceed the wickedness of all that went before him, and to leave such a villainous pattern unto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should endure to imitate.

How Zacharia was murdered by Joas.

Sundry Prophets having laboured in vain to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia the son of Jeboabaz the Priest, was stirred up at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickedness, and make them understand the punishment due unto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so much honoured, and son to a man so exceedingly beloved in his life time, and revered, that if Joas had reputed him (as Abah did Elias) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honesty to have cloaked his ill affection, and have used at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had born unto the King, and the unaccountable benefits which they had done unto him, from his first infancy, were such, as should have placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured love of Joas, yea though he had been otherwise a man of very small mark, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reverence, how simple soever he appears that brings it. But this King Joas, having already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deal with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandmen, in that parable of our Saviour, dealt with the heir of the Vineyard; who said, This is the heir, come let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that he was no free Price, as long as one durst tell him the plain truth, how great soever that mans deservings were, that did so, yea though Gods commandment required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any form of open Law, as was practiced upon Naboth; or whether surprising him by any close treachery, I do neither read, nor can conjecture. The dignity of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracy, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publick judgement, though that the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, and by order of Law, inflicted upon malefactors, may argue the contrary. Most likely it is, that the Kings commandment, by which he suffered, took place in stead of Law: which exercise of meer power (as hath been already noted) was nothing strange amongst the Kings of Juda.

§. V.

How Joas was shamefully beaten by the Amerites, and of his death.

His odious murder, committed by an unthankful snake upon the man in whose bosom he had been fostered, as of it self alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hateful to men of his own time, and his memory detested in all ages; so had it the well described curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompany it unto the Throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell down swiftly, and heavily upon the head of that ungrateful monster. It was the last year of his reign; the end of his time coming then upon him, when he thought himself beginning to live how he listed without controulment. When that year was expired the Aramites came into the Country, rather as may seem to get pillage, than to perform any great action: for they came with a small company of men: but God had intended to do more by them, than they themselves did hope for.

That Joas naturally was a coward, his bloody malice against his best friend, is in my judgement proof sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when he might have levied (as his son after him did muster) three hundred thousand chosen men for the war, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when he might have his own will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encourter with a few bands of Rovers, he took a very great Army, so that wise men might well perceive, that he knew what he did, making them as if he would fight for his Country, and expose himself to danger of war, when as indeed all was meer ostentation and no peril to be feared; he going forth to strongly appointed, against so weak enemies. This might wise men think, and laugh at him in secret; considering what ado he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisdom of this world is foolishness, did laugh not only at this vain-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King Joas met, whether it were by some folly of the Leaders or by some amencement happening among the soldiers, or by whatsoever means it pleased God to work, so it was, that that great Army of Juda received a notable overthrow, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Juda, at whose persuasion the King had become a Rebel to the King of Kings. As for Joas himself (as Abulensis and others expound the story) he was sorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they think) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessive ransom.

And surely, all circumstances do greatly strengthen this conjecture: for the Text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised upon Joas ignominious judgments; and that departing from him, they dismissed him, in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-favoredly. Now at that time Joas the son of Jehoash reigned over Israel, and Benhadad the son of Israhel over the Syrians, in Damascus: the one a valiant undertaking Prince, raised up by God to restore the State of his miserable Country, the other inferior every way to his father, of whose purchases he lost a great part, for want of skill to keep it. The difference in condition found between these two Princes, promising no other event than such as afterward followed, might have given to the King of Juda good cause to be bold, and pluck up his spirits, which Hazael had beaten down, if God had not been against him. But his fearful heart being likely to quake upon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with some shew of war at his doores, it were easie to make him crave any tolerable conditions of peace. The unexpected good success hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as unsuspected) ill success, which the Aramites found in their following was against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weakness of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his Ordinance, both the Kingdom of Juda, after more than forty years time of gathering strength, was unable to drive out a small company of Enemies; and the Kingdom of Israel, having so been trodden down by Hazael, that only fifty Horsemen, ten Charriots, and ten thousand footmen were left: prevailed against his Son, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are every-where found, and therefore I will not insist upon this; though indeed we should not, if we be Gods children, think it more tedious to hear long and frequent reports of our heavenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore-fathers upon earth.

When the Aramites had what they listed, and saw that they were not able, being so few, to take any possession of the Country, they departed out of Juda laden with spoil, which they sent to Damascus, themselves being like falling upon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not half so well. The King of Juda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sons of an Ammonitess, and of a Moabitess, whom some (because only their Mothers names, being strangers, are expressed) think to have been bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or fear, left (as Tyrants use) he should revenge disaster upon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoever else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture tells us plainly, that, For the blood of the children of ^{15.} Jehojada, this befell him. And the same appears to have been used as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazias, the son and successor of Joas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdom was established: but contrariwise his body was judged unworthy of burial in the Sepulchres of the Kings: whereby it appears, that the death of Zacharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his son, upon the Traytors, which well deserved death.

Of the Princes living in the time of Joas: of the time when Carthage was built: and of Dido.

Here lived with Joas, Mezades, and Dionetius in Athens: Eudemus and Arifonides in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Sylvius, and after him Sylvius Aladins, were Kings of the Albans in Italy. Ocraxapes, commonly called Anacyndaraxes, the thirty seventh King succeeded unto Opratanes, began his reign over the Assyrians, about the eighteenth year of Joas, which lasted forty two years. In the sixteenth of Joas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sefac, succeeded unto Cheops in the Kingdom of Egypt, and held it fifty years.

In this time of Joas, was likewise the reign of Phigalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dido; the building of which City is, by divers authors, placed in divers ages, some reporting it to be 70. years younger than Rome, others above 400. years elder, few or none of them giving any reason of their assertions, but leaving us uncertain whom to follow: Josephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred forty and three years and eight months from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth year of Hyram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seventh of Phigalion. The particulars of this account (which is not rare in Josephus) are very perplexed, and serve not very well to make clear the total sum. But whether it were so that Josephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write some number of the years, which he reckoned in Fractions, as they were divided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hyram to Phigalion, we may well enough believe, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose books he gives us the whole sum, had good means to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, between two works no longer following one the other than the memory of three or four generations might easily reach. This hundred forty and four years current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleventh year of Joas, was a hundred forty and three years before the birth of Rome; and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: a time so long after the death of Aeneas, that we might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

hospes,
Assimulata modis pulchraque virificis.
Talis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxit, erat mens,
Vita nec incestus leta cupidinitibus:
(Namque nec Aeneas vidit mo Troius unquam, Nec Elyham advenit, clausibus Ithacis.
Sed furias fugiens, atque arma precacis Iarboe, Servatus, fletore, moris pudicitiam;
Pecore transfixo cello quod perituli enses)
Non furor, aut lesio crudus amore dolor.
Sic cecidisse juvat: vixi sine vulnere fame,
Vlti vitum, postis manibus appeti.
Invida cur in me simulasti Musa Maronem,
Fingeret in nostra daemna pudicitia?
Vos magis Historicis lectores credite de me
Quam qui furti Deum concubitusq; canunt.
Falsidici vates: temerant qui carmine verum,
Humanisque deos assimulant vitiiis.

Which in effect is this:

I Am that Dido which thou here dost see,
Cunningly fram'd in beauteous Imag'rie,
Like this I was, but had not such a foul,
As Maro feign'd, incestuous and foul.
Aeneas never with his Trojan hoast
Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
But flying proud Iarbas villanie,
Not mov'd by furious love or jealousy,
I did with weapon chaste, to save my fame,
Make way for death untimely, ere it came.
This was my end; but first I built a Town,
Revenge'd my husbands death, liv'd with renown.
Why did'st thou stir up Virgil, envious Muse,
Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
Readers, believe Historians; not those Which to the world Joves thefts and vice expose.
Poets are liars, and for Verses sake,
Will make the Gods of humane crimes partake.

From the time of Dido unto the first Punic war, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and conquests, we find in many Histories: but in particular we find little of the Carthaginian affairs before that war, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts of the Isle of Sicily. We will therefore defer the relation of matters concerning that mighty City, until such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the mean while the History that is now in hand.

The beginning of Amasia his reign: of Joas King of Israel, and Elisha the Prophet.

Amasia, the son of Joash, being twenty five years old when his Father died, took possession of the Kingdom of Juda, wherein he laboured so to demean himself, as his new beginning reign might be least offensive. The Law of Moses he professed to observe; which howsoever it had been secretly despised since the time of Jehoram, by many great persons of the Land, yet had it by provision of good Princes, yea, and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deep root in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conform himself unto it. And at that present time, the slaughter which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the service of God, being seconded by the death of the King himself, even whilst that execrable murder, committed by the King upon Zacharia, was yet fresh in memory, did serve as a notable example of Gods justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amasia from following the way, which led to such an evil end. He therefore, having learned of his father the art of dissimulation, did not only forbear to punish the Traitors that had slain King Joas, but gave way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Jehoram formerly had been in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda. Nevertheless, after this, when (belike) the noise of the people having wearied it self into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done, was applauded as the handy-work of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as having done well, seeing it was not ill taken: the King, who perceived his government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heat of mens affections being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish between their treasons and Gods judgments, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to live: which could not but give contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a just Prince, rather than of a revenging son. This being done, and his own life better secured, by such exemplary justice, against the like attempts, Amasia carried himself outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteen years.

As Amasia gathered strength in Juda by the commodity of a long peace, so Joas the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the war hotly against the Aramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had been, worshipping the Calves of Jeroboam. For this sin had God so plagued the house of Jehu, that the ten tribes wanted little of being utterly consumed, by Hazeael and Benhadad, in the time of Jehu and his son Jehoahaz. But as Gods benefits to Jehu, sufficed not to withdraw him from this pollitic Idolatry, so were the miseries, rewarding that impiety, unable to reclaim Jehoahaz from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, did condescend unto the prayers of this ungodly Prince, even then when he and his miserable subjects, were oblate in following their own abominable ways. Therefore in temporal matters the ten Tribes recovered apace; but the favour of God which had been infinitely more worth, I do not find, nor believe that they sought: that they had it not, I find in the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to Amasia, the Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim.

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisha, who lived in those times, did foretell the prosperity of the Israelites under the reign of Joas; or whether Jehoahaz, wearied and broken with long adversity, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himself in part of the heavy cares attending those unhappy Syrian Wars, by laying the burthen upon his hopeful son; we find that in the thirty seventh year of Joas, King of Juda, Joas the son of Jehoahaz began to reign over Israel in Samaria; which was in the 15. year of his fathers reign, and some two or three years before his death.

It appears that this young Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did so well husband that poor stock that he received from his Father, often Chariots, fifty Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that he might seem likely to prove a thriver. Amongst other circumstances, the words which he spake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no less. For Joas visiting the Prophet, who lay sick, spake unto him thus, O my father, my father, the Chariots of Israel, and the horsemen of the same: by which manner of speech he did acknowledge, acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his kingdom in more stead than all the Horses and Chariots could doe.

This prophet who succeeded unto Elias, about the first year of Joram the son of Abah King of Israel died (as some have probably collected) about the third or fourth year of this Joas, the Nephew of Jehu. To shew how the spirit of Elias was doubled, or did rest upon him, it exceedeth my faculty. This is recorded of him, that he did not only raise a dead child unto life, as Elias had done, but when he himself was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life unto a carcase, which touched them in the grave. In fine, he bestowed as a legacie, three victories upon King Joas, who thereby did set Israel in a faire way of recovering all that the Aramites had usurped, and weakening the kings of Damascus in such sort, that they were never after terrible to Samaria.

§. VIII.

Of Amasia his war against Edom; His Apostacy, and overthrow by Joas.

The happy success which Joas had found in his war against the Aramites, was such as might kindle in Amasia a desire of undertaking some expedition, wherein himself might purchase the like honour. His Kingdom could furnish three hundred thousand serviceable men for the Wars, and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of war he had very just against the Edomites, who having rebelled in the time of his grand-father Jehoram, had about fifty years been unreclaimed, partly by reason of the troubles happening in Juda, partly through the sloth and timorousness of his father Joas. Yet, forasmuch as the men of Juda had in many years been without all exercise of War (excepting that unhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of wisdom to increase his forces, with soldiers waged out of Israel, whence he hired for an hundred talents of silver, an hundred thousand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth us, though Josephus diminisheth the number, saying that they were but twenty thousand.

This great Army, vvich vvith so much cost Amasia had hired out of Israel, he vvvas faine to dismiss before he had employed it, being threatened by a Prophet vvith ill success, if he strengthened himself vvith the help of those men, vvhom God (though in mercy he gave them victory against the cruel Aramites) did not love, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dismissal, as an high disgrace, vvith to revenge, they fell upon a piece of Juda in their return, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men, and some spoil, which they carried away. But Amasia vvith his own forces, knowing that God vvould be assistant to their journey, entered courageously into the Edomites Country, over vvhom obtaining victory, he slew ten thousand, and took other ten thousand prisoners, all vvich he threw from an high rock; holding them, it seems, rather as Traytors, than as just enemies. This victory did not seem to reduce Edom vvith the subjection of the Crown of Juda, vvich might be the cause of that severity, vvich vvvas used to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the lives of their friends and kinsmen at so dear a rate, as the loss of their own liberty. Some towns in Mount Seir, Amasia took, as appears by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they vvvere the places most indefensible, in that he left no garrisons there, vvhereby he might another year the better have pursued the conquest of the vvhole countrey. Howsoever it vvvere, he got both honour by the journey, and gains enough, had he not lost himself.

Among other spoils of the Edomites, vvvere carried away their gods, vvich being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserve vvell to be led in triumph. But they contrari vvise, I know not by vvhat strange vvitchcraft, so vvell as the unworthy King Amasia that he left them up to be his gods, and worshipped them, and burned incense unto them.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, he gave a churlish and threatening answer; asking the Prophet, vvho made him a Counsellor, and bidding him hold his peace for fear of the vvorse. If either the costly stultie, vvhereof these Idols vvvere made, or the curious vvorkmanship and beauty, vvith vvich they vvvere adorned by Artificers, had ravished the Kings fancy; methinks, he should have rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as household ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby have suffered himself to be blinded, vvith such unreasonable devotion towards them. If the superstitious account vvherein the Edomites had held them, vvvere able to vvork much upon his imagination; much more should the bad service vvich they had done to their old Clients, have moved him therewith to laugh, vvith the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seems to me, that the same affections carried him from God, unto the service of Idols, which afterwards moved him to talk so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such auxiliarie forces as he had gathered out of Israel; which done, it is said, that he was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him fail of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason he should have limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was that Esaia having broken the yoke of Jacob from his neck, according as Isaac had foretold, should no more become his servant. If therefore Amaziah did hope to reconquer all the country of Edom, he failed of his expectations; yet so, that he brought home both profit and honour, which might have well contended with him.

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, wherewith men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe unto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to use their own industry, courage, or foresight. Therefore it is commonly seen, that they, who entering into battell, are careful to pray for aide from heaven, with due acknowledgment of his power, who is the giver of victory; when the field is won, doe vaunt of their own ex-ploits; one telling how he got such a ground of advantage; another, how he gave check to such a battalion; a third, how he seized on the enemies Canons, every one striving to magnifie himself, whilst all forget God, as one that had not been present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans virtue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better successe, than he did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happinesse; so he whose meer wisdom and labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himself thankful, both for the victory, and for those virtues by which the victory was gotten. And indeed so far from weakness is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may well be called the height of magnanimity; no virtue being so truly heroical, as that by which the spirit of man advanceth it self with confidence of acceptance, unto the love of God. In which sense it is a brave speech that Evander in Virgil useth to Aeneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition.

Finge Deo.*

With this Philosophy Amaziah (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had shewed himself a better man of war than any King of Juda, since the time of Jehoshaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should think him little inferior to David; of which honour he saw no reason why the prophets should rob him, who had made him loose an hundred talents, and done him no pleasure; he having prevailed by plain force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That he was dis tempered with such vain thoughts as these (besides the witness of his impiety following) Josaphat doth testifie saying, That he despised God, and that being puffed up with his good successe, of which nevertheless he would not acknowledge God to be the Authour, he commanded Joas King of Israel to become his subject, and to let the ten Tribes acknowledge him their Sovereign, as they had done his Ancestours King David and Salomon. Some think that his quarrel to Joas was rather grounded upon the injury done to him by the Israelites, whom he dismissed in the Journey against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him up, than the remembrance of an old title, forgotten long since, and by himself neglected thirteen, or fourteen years. Nevertheless it might so be, that when he was thus provoked, he thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question; that so the Kings of Israel might, at the least, learn to keep their subjects from offending Juda, for fear of endangering their own Crowns. Had Amaziah desired onely recompence for the injury done to him, it is not improbable that he should have had some reasonable answer from Joas, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answer which Joas returned, likening himself to a Cedar, and Amaziah in respect of him to no better than a thistle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent termes, fitt perhaps with such proud comparison of Nobility, as might be made (according to that which Josaphat hath written) between a King of ancient race and one of less Nobility than vertue.

It is by Sophacles reported of Ajax, that when going to the warre of Troy, his father did bid him to be valiant, and get victory by Gods assistance, he made answer, That by Gods assistance a coward could get victory, but he would get it alone without such help: after which proud speech, though he did many valiant acts, he had small thanks, and finally, killing himself in a madness, whereinto he fell upon disgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amaziah did utter such words, I do not find, but having once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such words, he was rewarded with successe accordingly. The very first counsell wherein this war was concluded, serves to prove that he was a wise Prince indeed at Jerusalem, among his Parastites, but a fool when he had to deal with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weak people, trusting more in the feat of their Country, than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Joas, who from so poor beginnings had raised himself to such strength, that he was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained up in a long victorious war. But as Amaziah discovered much want of judgment, in undertaking such a match; so in prosecuting the business, when it was set on foot, he behaved himself as a man of little experience, who having once onely tryed his fortune, and found it to be good, thought that in War there was nothing else to do, than send a defiance, fight, and win. Joas on the contrary side, having been accustomed to deal with a stronger enemy than the King of Juda, used that celerity, which peradventure had often stood him in good stead against the Aramite. He did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in & wasted his Country, but presented himself with an Army in Juda, ready to bid battell to Amaziah, and save him the labour of a long journey. This could not but greatly discourage those of Juda, who (besides the impression of fear, which an invasion beats into people, not inured in the like) having devoured in their greedy hopes, the spoile of Israel, fully persuading themselves to get as much, and at as easie a rate, as in the journey of Edom; were so far disappointed of their expectation that well they might suspect all new assurance of good luck, when the old had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had stomach enough to challenge the patrimony of Salomon, thought like another David to winne it by the sword. The issue of which fool-hardines might easily have been fore-seen in humane reason; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the quality of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the War. But meer humane wisdom, howsoever it might foresee much, could not have prognosticated all the mischief that fell upon Amaziah. For as soon as the two Armies came in sight, God, whose help this wretched, man had so despised, did (as Josaphat reports it) strike such terror and amazement into the men of Juda, that without one blow given, they fled all away, leaving their King to shift for himself; which he did so ill, that his enemy had soon caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abject baseness. That the Army which fled, sustained any other loss than of honour, I neither find in the Scriptures nor in Josaphat; it being likely that the soon beginning of their flight, which made it the more shameful, made it also the more safe. But of the mischief that followed this overthrow, it was Gods will that Amaziah himself should sustain the whole disgrace. For Joas carried him directly to Jerusalem, where he bad him procure that the gates may be opened to let him in and his Army; threatening him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable captive, with these dreadful words, that he durst do no other than persuade the Citizens, to yeild themselves to the mercy of the Conquerour. The Town, which afterwards being in weaker state held out two years against Nebuchadnezzar, was utterly dismaied, when the King that should have given his life to save it, used all his force of command and intreaty to betray it. So the gates of Jerusalem were opened to Joas, with which honour (greater than any King of Israel had ever obtained) he could not rest contented, but the more to despise Amaziah and his people, he caused 400. cubits of the wall to be thrown down, and entered the City in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him as in triumph. This done, he sack'd the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and so taking hostages of Amaziah, he dismissed the poor creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

A discourse of the reasons hindering Joas from uniting Juda to the Crown of Israel, when he had won Jerusalem, and held Amaziah prisoner. The end of Joas his reign.

WE may justly marvel how it came to pass, that Joas, being thus in possession of Jerusalem, having the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, and his own entire, could be so content to depart quietly with a little spoil, when he might have seized upon the whole Kingdom. The reign of Athalia had given him cause to hope that the issue of David might be dispossessed of that Crown; his own nobility, being the son and grand-child of Kings, together with the famous acts that he had done, were enough to make the people of Juda think highly of him; who might also have preferred his form of government before that of their own Kings, especially at such a time, when a long succession of wicked Princes had smothered the thanks which were due to the memory of a few good ones. The commodity that would have ensued upon the union of all the twelve Tribes under one Prince, is so apparent, that I need not to insist on it. That any message from God forbade the Israelite (as afterwards in the victory which Pekah the son of Romelia got upon Ahaz) to turn his present advantage to the best use, we do not read. All this makes it the more difficult to resolve the question, why a Prince so well exercised as Joas had been in recovering his own, and winning from the enemy, should forsake the possession of Jerusalem, and wilfully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away the assurance of so fair a conquest, as the Kingdom of Juda.

But concerning that point, which of all others had been most material, I mean the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainly seen, that entering Jerusalem in triumphant manner, Joas was unable to concoct his own prosperity. For, the opening of the gates had been enough to have let him not only into the City, but into the Royal Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by fair intreaty (especially having sure means of compulsion) he might have made his own, when they saw themselves betrayed, and basely given away by him whose they had been before. The fair mark which this opportunity presented, he did not aim at, because his ambition was otherwise, and more meanly busied, in levelling at the glory of a triumphant entry through a breach. Yet this error might afterwards have been corrected well enough, if entering as an enemy, and shewing what he could do, by spending his anger upon the Walls, he had within the City done offices of a friend, and laboured to shew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done his courtesies began, and sought to please itself with that which is commonly most ready to the spoiler, yet should be most forbore. The Treasure wherewith Sesac, Hazeael, and the Philistines, men ignorant of the true God and his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirst, ought not to have tempted the appetite of Joas, who though an Idolater, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternal God, whose Temple was at Jerusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to seize that holy place, and lay his ravenous hands upon the consecrated vessels, calling the family of Obed-Edom (whose children had hereditary charge of the treasure) to a strict account, as if they had been officers of his own exchequer; they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a noble Prince, an Israelite, and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most virtuous King of our age (taking it with the same phrase) hath wisely avoided; by stealing a few Apples, he lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few days, might, by comparing themselves one to one, perceive his Soldiers to be no better than men of their own mould, and inferior in number to the inhabitants of so great a City. It is not so easy to hold by force a mighty town entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by unadvised fear. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recover their spirits, and begin to understand their first error, they will think upon every advantage, of place, of provisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-stones; and rather choose by desperate resolution, to correct the evils grown out of their former cowardice, than suffer those mischiefs to poison the body, which in such half-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more lively example hereof cannot be desired, than the City of Florence, which through the weakness of Peter de Medices, governing therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard terms, that it opened the gates unto the French King Charles the eighth, who not plainly professing himself either friend or foe to the State, entered the Town, with his Army, in triumphant manner, himself and his horse armed, with his lance upon his thigh. Many insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrelling ministred between them and the Towns-men: so far forth that the Florentines, to preserve their liberty, were driven to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable conditions, demanding huge sums of ready money, and the absolute Seigniorship of the State, as conquered by him, who entered the City in Arms. But Peter Caponi, a principal Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretary, and tearing them before his face, bad him sound his Trumpets, and they would ring their Bells: which peremptory words made the French bethink themselves, and come readily to this agreement ment, that for forty thousand pounds, and not half of that money to be paid in hand, Charles should not only depart in peace, but restore whatsoever he had of their Dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seem for that brave Army, which in few months after was the Kingdom of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous City. It is true, that Charles had other business (and so perhaps had Joas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houles, usually draws every Citizen to save his own, leaving victory to the Soldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolved, women can quench, as fast as the enemy, having other things to look unto, can set on fire. And indeed that Commander is more given to anger than regardful of profit, who upon the uncertain hope of destroying a Town, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. Diversity of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Jerusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly soever Joas might hold himself within Jerusalem, he could not easily depart from thence, with his booty safe, if the Army of Juda, which had been more terrified than weakened in the late encounter, should re-enforce itself, and give him a check upon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better security, his Army being upon return, and better laden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more unapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the City and without, serving to cool the ambition of Joas, and keep it down from aspiring to the Crown of Juda; it appears that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisba the Prophet; who, when this Joas had smitten the ground with his arrows thrice, told him that he should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probability, referred unto the fifth, sixth, and seventh years of Joas: after which time, if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good success, ill might the King of Israel have likened himself to a stately Cedar, and worse could he have either lent the Judean one hundred thousand men, or meet him in battell, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his own. Seeing therefore it is made plain by the words of Elisba, that after three victories Joas should find some change of fortune and suffer loss; we must needs conclude, that the Aramite prevailed upon him this year, it being the last of his Reign. That this was so, and that the Syrians, taking advantage of Joas his absence gave such a blow to Israel, as the King at his return was not able to remedy, but rather fell himself into new misfortunes which increased the calamities; we may evidently perceive in that which is spoken of Jeroboam his son. For it is said, That the Lord Jaw the exceeding bitter affliction, of Israel, and that having not decreed to put out the name of Israel from under the Heaven, be preserved them by the hand of Jeroboam the sonne of Joas. This is enough to prove, that the victorious Reign of Joas was concluded with a sad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple hastening his misery and death, as they had done with Sesac, Athalia, and Hazeael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Craspus, and other sacrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceived against him, by the people of Jerusalem, and courage which they took to set upon him within the Walls; or through preparation of the Army that lay abroad in the Countrey to bid him battel in open field, & recover by a new charge the honour which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought upon his own Countrey, by the Syrian in his absence (if not by all of these) Joas was driven to lay aside all thought of winning the Kingdom of Juda; and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste homewards, where he found a sad welcome, and being utterly forsaken of his wonted prosperity, forsook also his life in few months after, leaving his Kingdom to Jeroboam the second, his fortunate and valiant son.

The end of Amaziah his Reign and life.

Any man is able to guess how Amaziah looked, when the enemy had left him. He that had vaunted so much of his own great prowess and skill in Arms, threatening to work wonders, and set up a new the glorious Empire of David, was now uncased of his Lions hide, and appeared nothing so terrible as a beast as he had bin painted. Much argument of scoffing at him he had ministred unto such as held him in dislikes; which at this time doubtless were very many: for the shame that falls upon an insolent man, seldom fails of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amaziah, (besides

(besides that the multitude are always prone to lay the blame upon their Governors, even of those calamities which happen by their own default) there was no child in all Jerusalem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischief. He had not only challenged a good man of War, being himself a Dastard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common enemy, to have him let into the City, that with his own eyes he might see what spoil there was, and not make a bad bargain by hear-say. The father of this Amazias was a beastly man; yet when the Aramites took him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his own life at so dear a rate, as the City and Temple of Jerusalem. Had he offered, should they have made his promise good? surely the haste which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was very unfortunate: for by keeping out the Israelites (which was easie enough) any little while, they should soon have been rid of him, seeing that the Aramites would have made him run home, with greater speed than he came forth. Then also, when having trusted up his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would have served to persuade him to leave his load behind; had not their good King delivered up hostages, to secure his return, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his pains taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this unhappy King: it had been well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault unto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But we find no mention of his amendment. Rather it appears, that he continued an idolater to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Jerusalem: a manifest proof that he was not reclaimed unto his lives end. And certainly, they which tell a man in his adversity of his faults passed, shall sooner be thought to upbraid him with his fortune, than to seek his reformation. Wherefore it is no marvel, that Priests and Prophets were less welcome to him, than ever they had been. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereto themselves might always be masters, wanted no plausible matter to revive him. For he was not the first, nor second of the Kings of Juda, that had been overcome in battle. David himself had abandoned the City, leaving it before the enemy was in sight, unto Abishon his rebellious Son. Many besides him had received losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Joas might so easily have been kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sefac in? Asa was reputed a virtuous Prince, yet with his own hands he emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessity of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no Actions but of dead Princes: if so, he should rather live to punish them, than die to please them. Though wherein had he given them any cause of displeasure? It was he indeed that commanded to set open the gates to Joas; but it was the people that did it. Good servants ought not to have obeyed their Masters Commandments to his disadvantage, when they saw him not master of his own Person. As his captivity did acquit him from blame of all things that he did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it self, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his loss. For had he been as hasty to fly as others were, he might have escaped as well as others did. But seeking to teach the base multitude courage by his Royal example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom he trusted. Unworthy creatures, that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans words, being prisoner, he commanded them to yield; having neglected his charge, when leading them into the field, he had them stand to it and fight like men. The best was, that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand lives were saved; the enemy having wisely preferred the surprize of a Lion that was Captain, before the chase and slaughter of an Army of Stags that followed him.

These or the like words comforting Amazias, were able to persuade him, that it was even so indeed. And such excuses might have served well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But he that was unwilling to ascribe unto God the good success foretold by a Prophet; could easily find how to impute this late disaster unto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seems that he meant to keep himself safe from her by sitting still; for in fifteen years following (so long he out-lived his honour) we find not that he stirred. As for his subjects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his government, yet we may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred to his own ruine. He that suspecteth his own worth or other mens opinions, thinking the less regard is had of his person than he believeth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authority in purchasing the name of a severe man. For the affected sowness of a vain fellow, doth many times resemble the gravity of one that is wise: and the fear wherein they live, which are subject unto oppression, carries a shew of reverence to him that does the wrong; at least it serves to dazzle the eyes of underlings, keeping them from prying into the weakness of such as have jurisdiction over them. Thus the time, wherein, by well using it, men might attain to be such as they ought, they do usually mispend, in seeking to appear such as they are not. This is a vain and deceivable course; procuring, in stead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence; especially when an unable spirit, being over-perturbed with so high authority, is too passionate in the execution of such an office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazias thought by extreme rigour to hold up his reputation, what did he else than strive to make the people think he hated them, when of themselves they were apt enough to believe that he did not love them? the best was, that he had, by revenging his fathers death, provided well enough for his own security: but who should take vengeance (or upon whom?) of such a murder, wherein every one had a part? Surely God himself, who had not given commandment or leave unto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the blood of his Anointed. Yet as Amazias careless of God, was carried headlong by his own affections; so his subjects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged unto their duties, rose up against him, with such headlong fury, that being unable to defend himself in Jerusalem, he was driven to forsake the City, and fly to Lachis, for safeguard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceived against him, and so general, that neither his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capital City, nor his presence in the Country abroad procure friends to defend his life. Questionless he chose the Town of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found he there none other favour, than that the people did not kill him with their own hands; for when the Conspirators (who troubled not themselves about raising an Army for the matter) sent pursuers after, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the utmost City of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Juda; so that he might have made an easie escape (if he durst adventure) into the Territory of the Philistines, or the Kingdom of Israel. Therefore it may seem that he was detained there, where certain it is that he found no kind of favour: for had not the people of this Town added their own treason to the general infurrection; the murderers could not at so good leisure as they did, have carried away his body to Jerusalem, where they gave him burial with his fathers.

§. XI.

Of the Inter-regnum, or vacancy, that was in the Kingdom of Juda, after the death of Amazias.

IT hath already been shewed, that the Reigns of the Kings of Juda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by compleat years, otherwhiles, by years current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last years of his fathers Reign, or the foremost of his sons. But we are now arrived at a meer vacation, wherein the Crown of Juda lay void eleven whole years: a thing not plainly set down in Scriptures, nor yet remembered by Josephus, and therefore hard to be believed, were it not proved by necessary consequence.

Twice we find it written, that Amazias, King of Juda, lived after the death of Joas 15. a. & King of Israel, fifteen years; whereupon it follows, that the death of Amazias, was about the end of fifteen years compleat, which Jeroboam the second (who in the fifteenth year of Amazias was made King over Israel) had reigned in Samaria. But the succession of Uzzias, who is also called Azarias, unto his father in the Kingdom of Juda, was eleven years later than the sixteenth of Jeroboam: for it is expressed, that Azarias began to reign in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam; the sixteenth year of his life, being joyned with the first of two and fifty that he reigned. So the Inter-regnum of eleven years cannot be divided, without some hard means used, of interpreting the Text otherwile than the letter sounds.

Yet some conjectures there are made, which tend to keep all even, without acknowledging any void time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam, we should perhaps understand the seven and twentieth year of his life; or else (because the like words are no where else interpreted in the like sense) that Azarias was eleven years under age, that is, five years old, when his father died, and so his sixteenth year might might concur with the seven and twentieth, of Jeroboam; or that the Text itself might have suffered some wrong; by miswriting twenty seven for seventeen years; and so, by making the seventeenth year of Jeroboam to be newly begun, all may be saved. These are the conjectures of that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the Author himself doth easily let it pass, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit that upon every doubt, we should call the text in question; which could not be falsified in all copies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Azaria began his Reign being five years old; but then must we add those eleven years which passed in his minority, to the two and fifty that followed his sixteenth year, which is all one in a manner, with allowing an Inter-regnum.

But we should we be so careful to avoid an Inter-regnum in Juda, seeing that the like necessity hath enforced all good Writers to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few years, in the Kingdom of Israel? The space of time between Jeroboam's death, and the beginning of Zachariah's reign, and such another gap found between the death of Pekah, and the beginning of Hosea, have made it easily to be admitted into Samaria; which the consideration of things as they stood in Juda, when Amaziah was slain, doth make more probable to have happened there, yea, although the necessity of computation were not so apparent.

For the publick fury having so far extended itself, as unto the destruction of the Kings own person, was not likely to be appeased without order taken for obtaining some redress of those matters, which had caused it at the first to break forth into such extremity. We need not therefore wonder how it came to pass, that they which already had thrown themselves into such an horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the Crown from a Prince of that age, which being invested in all ornaments of Regality, is nevertheless exposed to many injuries, proceeding from head-strong, and forgetful subjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Azaria to have been King but one and forty years, after he came out of his non-age; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too harshly with the Text. The best opinion were that which gives unto Jeroboam eleven years of reign with his Father, before he began to reign single in the fifteenth of Amaziah; did it not swallow up almost the whole reign of Joas, and extending the years of those which reigned in Israel (by making such of them complet as were once current) and take at the shortest the reigns of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: every man may follow his own opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronological Table, drawn for these purposes.

Of Princes Contemporary with Amaziah, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

The Princes living with Amaziah, and in the eleven years that followed his death, were Joas and Jeroboam in Israel; Cephrenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Sylusius Aladus, and Sylusius Aventinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognetus Pheredus, and Arpilron in Athens; in Lacedaemon Theclaus, in whose time the Spartans was from the Acadians, Geranthe, Amycla, and some other Towns.

But more notable than all these, was Affrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth year of Amaziah, succeeding his father Ocraxapes or Anacyndaraxes, reigned twenty years, and was slain the last of the eleven void years which fore-went the reign of Azaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thousand two hundred and forty years. A most luxurious and effeminate Pailiard he was, passing away his time among strumpets, whom he imitated both in apparel and behaviour.

In these voluptuous courses he lived an unhappy life, knowing himself to be so vile, that he durst not let any man have a sight of him; yet seen he was at length, and the sight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruin. For Arbaces, who governed Media under him, finding means to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that beastly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans attire, and striving to counterfeit an harlot, that he thought it a great shame to live under the command of so unworthy a creature. Purposing therefore to free himself and others from so base subjection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Belshis or Belofus a Chaldean, who told him plainly, that the Kingdom of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleased with the Prophecy, did promise unto Belofus himself the government of Babylonia; and so concluding how to handle the business, one of them stirred up the Medes, and allured the Persians into the quarrel, the other persuaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themselves in the same cause. These four Nations armed forty thousand men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himself, but gathering such forces as he could out of other Nations, encountered the rebels, as one that would by deeds refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that War, answer to the manner of his retiredness. For in three battles he carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearful terms, that had not Belofus promised them constantly some unexpected succours, they would forthwith have broken up their Camp. About the same time, an Army out of Bactria was coming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountering it upon the way, persuaded so strongly by promise of liberty, that those forces joyned themselves with his. The sudden departure of the enemy seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Army, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came upon him by night, and forced his Camp, which through overgreat security was unprepared for resistance.

This overthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his Wives brother Salamenus to keep the field, he withdrew himself into the City of Nineve; which, till new aids that he sent for should come, he thought easily to defend; it having been prophesied, that Nineve should never be taken, till the River were enemy to the Town. Of the greatness and strength of Nineve, enough hath been spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well vitualled, that Arbaces (having in two battels overthrow the Kings Army, and slain Salamenus) was fain to lye two whole years before it, in hope to win it by famine; whereof yet he saw no appearance. It seems that he wanted Engines and skill to force those walls, which were an hundred foot high, and thick enough for three Chariots in front to pass upon the rampire. But that which he could not do in two years, the River of Tigris did in the third: for being high swollen with rains, it not only drowned a part of the City through which it ran, but threw down twenty furlongs of the wall, and made a fair breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no means of resistance left, shutting up himself into his Palace, with his Wives, Eunuchs, and all his Treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith he and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a Monument of his, that was in Anchiale, a City of Strab. l. 5. Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription; shewing that he built that City and Tharsus upon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eat and drink, and make merry, encouraged others with verses well known, to a voluptuous life, by his own example testified that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any virtue becoming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with a dagger. But the more general consent of Writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Achilles a Greek Writer, that lived in the Court of Persia; where the truth might best be known.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Affria, from the time of Semiramis, unto Sardanapalus, though I believe that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) busied in offensive, or else defensive arms; yet for the most part of them I do better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were overpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memory. Whatsoever they did, that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath said of them is very true; Silence and Oblivion hath oppressed them.

CHAP. XXIII.
Of UZZIA.

S. I.

The prosperity of Uzzia, and of Jeroboam the second, who reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchy that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Jeroboam. Of Zacharia, Sallum, Menahem, and Pekahia.

Uzzia, who is called Ahazias, the son of Jotham, was made King of Juda, when he was sixteen years old, in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam the son of Joas King of Israel. He served the God of his father David, and had therefore good success in all his enterprises. He built Eloth, a Town that stood near to the Red Sea, and restored it to Juda. He overcame the Philistines, of whose Towns he dismantled some, and built others in sundry parts of their Territories. Also he got the mastery over some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his prosperous Wars, wherein (as Josephus rehearseth his acts) he began with the Philistines; and then proceeded unto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Army consisted of three hundred and seven thousand men of War, over which were appointed two thousand and six hundred Captains. For all this multitude the King prepared shields, and *spear*s, and helmets, and other Arms requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite unto that which some of his late predecessors had held, who thought it better policy to use the service of the Nobility, than of the multitude; carrying forth to war the Princes, and all the Chariots.

As the victories of Uzzia were far more important, than the achievements of all that had reigned in Juda, since the time of David; so were his riches and magnificent works, equal, if not superiour to any of theirs that had been Kings between him and Salomon. For, besides that great conquests are won to repay the charges of War with triple interest, he had the skill to use, as well as the happiness to get. He turned his lands to the best use, keeping Ploughmen and Dresters of Vines, in grounds convenient for such husbandry. In other places he had Cattel feeding; whereof he might well keep great store, having won so much from the Ammonites and Arabians; that had abundance of waste ground serving for pasture. For defence of his Cattel and Herdsmen, he built Towers in the Wilderness. He also digged many Cisterns or Ponds. Josephus calls them Water-courses; but in such dry grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towers he so commanded the water, that none could without his consent, relieve themselves therewith, questionless he took the only course, by which he might securely hold the Lordship over all the Wilderness; it being hardly passable, by reason of the extreme drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the use of Travellers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundry Towns among the Philistines; he repaired the wall of Jerusalem, which Joas had broken down, and fortified it with Towers, whereof some were an hundred and fifty Cubits high.

The state of Israel did never so flourish, as at this time, since the division of the twelve Tribes into two Kingdoms. For as Uzzia prevailed in the South, so (if not more) Jeroboam the son of Joas, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories against the Syrians, he wan the Royal City of Damascus, and he wan Hamah, with all the country thereabout from the entering of Hamah, unto the Sea of the Wilderness; that is (as the most expound it) unto the vast desarts of Arabia, the end whereof was undiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in time of this Jeroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had been in the reign of David.

But it was not for the piety of Jeroboam, that he thrived so well, for he was an Idolater: it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction wherinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the succession of war, and to throw the victorious Aramites under the feet of those whom they

they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Jehu to which God had promised the Kingdom of Israel unto the fourth generation, was now not far from the end; and now again it was invited unto repentance by new benefits, as it hath been at the beginning. But the son of Jeroboam the son of Nebat was held so precious, that neither the Kingdom it self given to him by God, was able to draw Jehu from that politick Idolatry; nor the misery falling upon him and his posterity, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperity of Jeroboam the son of Joas, to make him render the honour that was due to the onely giver of victory. Wherefore the promise of God made unto Jehu, that his sons, unto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but being almost expired, gave warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that we who find no particulars recorded, can hardly ghes at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Jeroboam the son of Joas, after a victorious reign of one and forty years, had ended his life; it seems in all reason that Zacharia his son should forthwith have been admitted to reign in his stead; the Nobility of that race having gotten such a lustre by the immediate succession of four Kings, that any Competitor, had the Crown passed by election, must needs have appeared base; and the virtue of the last King having been so great, as might well serve to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the already confirmed right of a family so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twenty years did pass before Zacharia the son of Jeroboam was, by uniform consent, received as King. The true original causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calves did stand; yet second instruments of this disturbance are likely not to have been wanting upon which the wisdom of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captains of the army (who afterwards slew one another so fast, that in fourteen years there reigned five Kings) did now by head-strong violence, rend the Kingdom asunder, holding each what he could, and either despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia; untill, after many years, wearied with dissention, and the principal of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yield all quietly to the son of Jeroboam. That this Anarchy lasted almost three and twenty years, we find by the difference of time between the fifteenth year of Uzzia, which was the last of Jeroboam his one and fortieth (his seven and twentieth concurring with the first of Uzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Uzzia, in the last six moneths whereof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are some indeed that by supposing Jeroboam to have reigned with his father eleven years, do cut off the interregnum in Juda (before mentioned) and by the same reason abridge this Anarchy that was before the reign of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leave it twelve years long: which is time sufficient to prove that the Kingdom of the ten Tribes was no less disordered than as is already noted. But I chuse rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the World, than this doubtful conjecture, that gives to Jeroboam two and fifty years, by adding three quarters of his fathers reign unto his own; which was it self indeed so long, that he may well seem to have begun it very young; for I do not think that God blessed this Idolater both with a longer reign, and with a longer life than he did his servant David.

Thus much being spoken of the time wherein the Throne of Israel was void, before the reign of Zacharia; a little may suffice to be said of his reign it self, which lasted but a little while. Six months only was he King; in which time he declared himself a worshipper of the golden Calves; which was enough to justify the judgment of God; whereby he was slain. He was the last of Jehu's house, being (inclusively) the first of that line; which may have been some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the prophetic having determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended unto the utmost) there was no warrant given to Sallum, or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had been given to Jehu for the slaughter of Jeroboam, and for the eradication of Abrahams house.

Zacharia having been six moneths a King, was then slain by Sallum, who reigned after him, the space of a month in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I do not find; save only that he was a Traytor, and the son of one Jabeesh, whereby his father got no honour. It seems that he was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himself, and now when all other Competitors were fitten down, thought easily to prevail against that King, in whose person the race of Jehu was to fail. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong party: for Tippah or Thapsa, and the coast thereof even from Tirzah, where Menahem his enemy and supplanter planter then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one month, Sallum received the reward of his treason, and was slain by Menabem who reigned in his place.

Menabem the son of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten years. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane, for he not only destroyed Tiphaz, and all that were therein, or therabouts, but he ript up all their women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty been used in revenge of Zacharia's death, it is like that he would have been as earnest, in procuring unto him his Fathers Crown when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was used such long deliberation, that we may plainly discover Ambition, Disdain, and other private passions, to have been the causes of this beastly outrage.

In the time of Menabem, and (as it seems) in the beginning of his Reign, Pul, King of Assyria, came against the Land of Israel, whom this new King appeased, with a thousand talents of silver, levied upon all the substantial men in his Country. With this money the Israelite purchased, not only the peace of his Kingdom, but his own establishment therein: some factious man (belike) having either invited Pul thither, or (if he came uncalled) fought to use his help, in deposing this ill-beloved King. Josephus reports of this Menabem, that his reign was no milder than his entrance. But after ten years, his tyranny ended with his life: and Pekahia his Son occupied his room.

Of this Pekahia the story is short: for he reigned only two years: at the end whereof, he was slain by Pekia the son of Ramiah, whose treason was rewarded with the Crown of Israel, as, in time coming, another mans Treason against himself shall be. There needs no more to be said of Menabem and his son, save that they were both of them Idolaters, and the son (as we find in Josephus) like to his father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Assyrian King, who first opened unto those Northern Nations the way into Palestina: it will shortly follow in order of the Story, to deliver our opinion: whether he were that Belofus (called also Belshazzar, and by some Phul Belochus) who joyed with Arbaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that we relate the end of Uzzia's life, who out-lived the happiness wherein we left him.

§. II.

The end of Uzzia his Reign and Life.

As the zeal of Jehojada that godly Priest was the mean to preserve the lineage of David in the person of Joas, so it appears, that the care of holy men was not vinting to Uzzia, to bring him up and advance him to the Crown of Juda, vvhhen the hatred born to his Father Amaziah had endangered his succession. For it is said of Uzzia, That he sought God in the days of Zacharia (which understood the visions of God) and when as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper.

But, when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for he transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of Vesle: the Lord to burn incense upon the Altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his own authority, by meddling in the Priests office, vvhose power had in every extremity been so helpful to the Kings of Juda, that meer gratitude and civil policy, should have held back Uzzia from inchoating thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had been silent in this case, and not forbidding it. Howsoever, the King forgot his duty, the Priests remembered theirs, & God forgot not to assist them. Azaria the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gave him to understand how little to his honour it would prove, that he took upon him the office of the sons of Aaron. There were vvvith Azaria fourscore other Priests, valiant men, but their valour was shewed only in assisting the high Priest, vvhhen (according to his duty) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough the rest God himself performed. We find in Josephus, that the King had apparelled himself in Priestly habit, and that he threatened Azaria and his Companions, to punish them vvvith death, unless they would be quiet. Josephus indeed enlargeth the Story, by inserting a great Earth-quake, which did tear down half an Hill, that rowled four furlongs, till it rested against another Hill, stopping up the high-ways, and spoiling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth-quake he faith, that the roof of the Temple did cleave, and that a Sun-beam did light upon the Kings face, vvhich was presently infected vvvith leprosie. All this may have been true; and some there are vvhho think that this Earth-quake is the same, vvhich is mentioned by the Prophet Amos: vvhewherein they do much mis-reckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the days of Jereboam King of Israel, vvhho dyed seven and thirty years before Uzzia, so that Joatham the the son of Uzzia, vvhich supplied his Fathers place in government of the Land, should, by this account, have been then unborn: for he was but five and twenty years old, vvhhen he began to reign as King. Therefore, thus far only we have assurance; that while Uzzia was vvvith the Priests, the leprosie rose up in his fore-head, before the Priest. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, & to live in a house by himself until he dyed, the rule over the Kings house, and over all the Land, being committed to Joatham, his Son and Successour. Joatham took not upon himself the title of a King, till his Father was dead; vvhom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred; yet in a Monument apart from the rest, because he was a Leper.

§. III.

Of the Prophets which lived in the time of Uzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt, and in some other Countries.

In the time of Uzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah and Jonas. It is not indeed set down, when Joel or Obadiah did prophecy but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hierome's rule) with the next before them; then must these two be judged contemporary with Hosea and Amos, who lived under King Uzzia. To enquire which of these five was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least, a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived, hath so plentifully been sought, without reprehension, how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquity of these holy Prophets? It seems to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Jonas; who foretold the great victories of Jereboam King of Israel, and therefore is like to have prophesied in the days of Joas, whilest the afflictions of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it self intimating no less: by which consequence he was elder than the other Prophets, whose works are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdom of Israel are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seems, not without reason unto some very learned, to have belonged unto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose days Nineve was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings, now extant: in all the rest are found express promises of the Messias.

In the reign of Uzzia likewise it was, that,

Esay, the first of the four great prophets, began to see his visions. This difference of great and lesser prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they have left written (as S. Augustine gives reason of the distinction) because the greater have written larger Books. The prophet Esay was great indeed, not only in regard of his much writing, or of his Nobility, (for their opinion is rejected, who think him to have been the son of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he lived; but for the excellency both of his life and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole History of our Saviour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Evangelist, as a Prophet; having written in such wise, That (as Hierome saith) one would think he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an History of matters already past.

Bocchoris was King of Egypt, and the ninth year of his reign, by our computation (whereof in due place we will give reason) was current, when Uzzia took possession of the Kingdom of Juda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Aschis followed in the Kingdom of Egypt: unto him succeeded Amphis, and these two occupied that Crown six years. Then Sabacus, an Ethiopian, became King of Egypt, and held it fifty years, whereof the ten first ran along with the last of Uzzia his Reign and Life. Of these and other Egyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affairs shall come to be intermeddled with the business of Juda.

In Athens, the two last years of Arifbron his twenty, the seven and twentieth of Theophrastus, the twentieth of Agamemnon, and the three first of Egchilus his three and twenty, made even with the two and fifty of Uzzia: as likewise did in Alba the last seven of Silvius Aventinus: his seven and thirty, together with the three and twenty of Silvius Procas, and two and twenty the first of Silvius Amulius. In Media Arbaces began his new Kingdom in the first of Uzzia, wherein, after eight and twenty years, his son Sofarnus succeeded him, and reigned thirty years. Of this Arbaces, and the division of the Assyrian Empire, between him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to use more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great uncertainty in the story of the Assyrian Kings, who have already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. IV.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belofus were one person, or heads of sundry Families, that reigned a part in Nineve and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly been shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent, that the chief therein was Arbaces the Median: to whom the rest of the Confederates did not only submit themselves in that War, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him, receiving by his authority sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited lives. The first example of his power, was shewn upon Belofus the Babylonian, by whose special advice and help, Arbaces himself was become so great: Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannical a manner, as might give offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generality of the people. For in the condemnation of Belofus, he used the counsel of his other Captains, and then pardoned him of his own grace; allowing him to hold not only the City and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embellishing wherewith his life had been endangered.

In like manner, he gave rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Provinces; retaining (as it appears) jointly the Sovereignty to himself, which to use immoderately he did naturally abhor. He is said, indeed, to have excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding unto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the City of Nineve, permitting the Citizens nevertheless to take and carry away every one his own goods. The other Nations that joyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurements of liberty; which he himself so greatly loved, that by slacking too much the reins of his own Sovereignty, he did more harm to the general estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedom which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Country was pared narrower by Salmanassar, (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom we find in the Scriptures to have held some Towns of the Medes; and the civil administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces the first of Arbaces his Line, did make in that government, by reducing them into stricter terms of obedience,

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such as might in fourscore years, if not sooner, both extend it self unto the conquest of Israel, and tear away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Nineve, and subversion of the Assyrian Kingdom, wherewith the Medes, under Arbaces, had the honour, who may seem at that time to have kept the Assyrians under their subjection, when the rest of the Provinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who reigning afterwards in Babylon and Nineve, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their History is made uncertain.

I will first therefore deliver the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it, I will compare together the determination of that worthy man Joseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the judgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or have followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set down a part the severall authorities and arguments of sundry men, adding somewhat of weight, or of clearness one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will doe as briefly as I can, and without fear to be taxed of partiality, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancy of mine own, but merely led by those reasons, which upon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appear weak.

That which, until of late, hath passed as current, is this; That Belofus was the same King, who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palestina with an Armie; being called Phul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his authors with such as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skilfull Astrologer, subtle, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Assyria: finally that he reigned eight and fortie years, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglas-phalassar his son, in whose Posterity it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient proof, could not be gainsaid; for that Author (such as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, howsoever Annius his Authors deserve to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they asseme. They

They, who maintaine this Tradition, justify by divers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant unto no historie at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeed the foundation whereupon all have built) that Arbaces and Belofus were partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewise other Captains were with governments: but that any third person was so eminent, as to have Assyria it selfe, the chiefe Countrey of the Empire bestowed upon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any Historie. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should be committed unto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not meet to trust them in their own walls and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Nineve by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policy, because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept down from aspiring to recover the Sovereignty, which else they would have thought to belong, as of right, unto the Seat of the Empire.

Upon such considerations did the Romans, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage and dissolve the Corporation, or Body politicke, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Towns were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed over-dangerous, even to Rome it selfe, that was Mistrresse of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or four years had erected their Kingdome a-new, under one Phul? or what must this Phul have been (of whose deserving or entermidding, or indeed of whose very name, we find no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principall parts of the Empire fell either by general consent in division of the Provinces, or by his owne power and purchase very soon after? Surely he was none other than Belofus; whose neer neighbourhood gave him opportunity (as he was wise enough to play his own game) both to get Assyria to himselfe, and to empeach any other man that should have attempted to seize upon it. The Province of Babylon, which Belofus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a business: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his own hands all the gold and silver that had been in the Palace of Nineve. And questionless, to restore such a City as Nineve, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such means as Belofus had, which Phul, if he were not Belofus, is likely to have wanted.

Besides all this, had Phul been a distinct person from Belofus, and Lord of Assyria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not have been an easie matter for him, to pass quite through another mans Kingdom with an Army, seeking booty a far off in Israel: the only action by which the name of Phul is known. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Phul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers have called Belofus, Beleser, and Belus (in like manner as Josephus acknowledge, that he, whom the Scriptures called never otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the son of Asiages, and called of the Greeks by another name, that is, Cyaxeres) then is this scruple entirely removed. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border upon Syria and Palestina: so that Belofus having settled his affairs in Assyria towards the East and North, might with good leisure encroach upon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdom, to the South and West. He that looks into all particulars, may find every one circumstance concurring, to prove that Phul, who invaded Israel, was none other than Belofus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was overthrown, did enter into that action, merely for the love of Belofus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of main importance, to those that were to pass over Emphrates with an Army into Syria. Wherefore Belofus, that held good correspondence with them, and whose most fruitfull Province, adjoining to their barren quarters, might yearly do them inestimable pleasures, was not only likely to have quiet passage through their borders, but their utmost assistance: yea, it stands with good reason, that they who loved not Israel, should for their own behoofe have given him intelligence of the destructions and civil broyles among the ten Tribes; whereby as this Phul got a thousand talents, so it seems that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heavy neighbour of Jeroboam, recovered their own, setting up a new King in Damasco, and clearing the coast of Arabia. (from the Sea of the Wilderness to Hama) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations, divided by Emphrates, hold together in so good terms of friendship: it was ancient consanguinity, the memory whereof was available to the Syrians, in in the time of David, when the Aramites beyond the river came over willingly, to the succour of Haddazer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belofus had good reason to look into those parts: what a King reigning so far off as Nineve, should have to do in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdom had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

But concerning this last argument of the business which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, left it should seem to have ill coherence with that which hath been said of the long Anarchy that was in the ten Tribes. For if the Crown of Israel were worn by no man in three and twenty years, then is it likely that Belofus was either unwilling to stir, or unable to take the advantage when it was fairest and first discovered. This might have compelled those, who alone were not strong enough to seek after help from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belofus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belofus did pass the river of Euphrates, as soon as he found likelihood of making a prosperous journey, then may it seem that the inter-regnum in Israel was not so long as we have made it: for three and twenty years leisure would have afforded better opportunity, which ought not to have been lost.

For answer, hereunto we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they layd hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mighty, between the times of Arbaces and Deioces the Medes. Now, though it be held an error of Orosius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans was in a manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Eusebius do concur, that the authority of Arbaces did restrain the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardful only of self. Now, though some have conjectured that all Affrya was given to Belofus (as an overplus, besides the Provinces of Babylon which was his by plain bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high deservings; yet the opinion more commonly received, is, that he did only inchoate upon that Province by little and little; whilst Arbaces lived, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himself. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelve years between the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menabens his Reign; manifest it is, that the conquest of Affrya, and settling of that Country, was work enough to hold Belofus occupied, besides the restauration of Nineve, which alone was able to take up all the time remaining of his reign, if perhaps he lived to see it finished in his own days. So that this argument may rather serve to prove that Phul and Belofus were one person, forasmuch as the journey of Phul against Israel was not made until Belofus could find leisure; and the time of advantage which Belofus did let slip, argued his business in some other quarter, namely, in that Province of which Phul is called King. Briefly, it may be said, that he who conquered Affrya, and performed somewhat upon a Country so far distant as Palestina, was likely to have been, at least, named in some History, or, if not himself, yet his Country to have been spoken of for his victories: but we neither hear of Phul, in any prophane Author; neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoever of the Affryans, done in those times; whereas of Belofus, and the power of the Chaldeans, we find good Record.

Surely, that great slaughter of so many thousand Affryans, in the quarrel of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and unfortunate war, which overwhelmed the whole Country, ending but with the ruine and utter desolation of Nineve, must needs have so weakened the state of Affrya, that it could not in thirty years space be able to invade Palestina, which the ancient Kings, reigning in Nineve, had, in all their greatness, forborn to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Country, did help to enable Belofus to subdue it; who having once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interposition of that Country, secure of the Scythians, and other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turn Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdoms, whereinto civil dissention of the inhabitants, and the bordering envy of the Arabians and Aramites about Damasco, Friends and Cousins to the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, did invite him. For these, and the other before alledged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Phul in the Scriptures, ought to be understood of Belofus; even as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artaxerxes, and Ahasuerus, with the like, are thought, or known, to be meant the same whom prophane Historians, by names better known in their own Countreys, have called called Nabopolassar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath been written of old, or need to trouble our selves or others with framing new conjectures. This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted, other things of more importance will of themselves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Phul were Belofus, or some other man: the whole race of these Affryan and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabopolassar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopolassar (famous for the Astronomical observations recorded from their times) is the main ground of this contention. If therefore Belofus or Beljes were that Phul which invaded Israel; if he and his posterity reigned both in Nineve and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Aser, from whom Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Asarhaddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must seek Nabopolassar the Babylonian King, among those Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other than Salmanassar, who is known to have reigned in those years which Ptolemy the Mathematician hath assigned unto Nabopolassar. As for Meredach, who supplanted Afar-baddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disparuation.

But they that maintain the contrary part, will not be satisfied with such conjectures. They lay hold upon the conclusion, and by shaking that into peices, hope to overthrow all the premises upon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabopolassar that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanassar, or any of those other Affryan Kings, then it is manifest that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belofus were several Kings. This consequence is so plain, that it needs no confirmation. To prove that Nabopolassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworn to hold the contrary. For first, Nabopolassar was King of Babylon, and not of Affrya. This is proved by his name, which is merely Chaldean, whereas Salmanassar, the first part of Salmanassars name, is proper to the Affryans.

It is likewise proved by the Astronomical observations, which preceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Affryans, do shew that Nabopolassar, from whom Ptolemy draws that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Affryan. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the successor of Nabopolassar, which was Mardocempadus, called in his own language Mero-dac-ken-pad, Eisy 39. 1. but more briefly in Eisy his prophetic, Mero-dac by the former Part of his name; or Meredach Baladan the son of Baladan. Now if Meredach the son of Baladan King of Babel, were the sonne of Nabopolassar, then was Nabopolassar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Affrya.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabopolassar and Salmanassar, which in Greek, or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanassar carried captive some part of the ten Tribes, it may well be granted, that in the Province of Babylon, Salmanassar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it self. To conclude, Meredach began his reign over Babylon in the first year of Hexikia, at which time Salmanassar King of Babylon, therefore if Salmanassar were took Samaria, then must we say that he and Meredach, yea, and Nabopolassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Joseph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion founded upon likelihood of conjectures, hath drawn his proofs from matter of more necessary inference.

Touching all that was said before of Phul Belofus, for the proving that Phul and Belofus were not sundry Kings; Joseph Scaliger pities their ignorance, that have spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painfull men he confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might have won the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annus his Authors, given such offences that men refused thereupon to read their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine own part, howsoever I beleieve nothing that Annus his Terminus, Metaphases, and others of that stamp affirm, in respect of their bare authority; yet am I not so flegmatick, but that I can well enough digest a good Book, though I find the names of one or two of these good fellows alledged in it! I have (somewhat peradventure to often) already spoken my mind of Annus his Authors: Nevertheless, I may say here again; that where other Historics are silent, or speak not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we find, and ferveth to explain or enlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeed are those honest and painful men (as Scaliger terms them, meaning, if I mistake him not, good silly fellows) who set down the Affrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belosus, and Salmanassar for Nabonassar, such Writers as a man should be ashamed or unwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Aunius, though disliking him in general) Gerard Mercator is not so slight a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doors with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons between Scaliger and Mercator; they were both of them men notably learned: let us examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force as cannot either be refuted or avoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Affria, some men doubt whether Scaliger's reasons be enough to prove. For though Nabonassar be a Chaldean name, and Salmanassar an Affrian; yet what hinders us from believing that one man in two languages might be called by two several names? That Astronomy flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to prove Nabonassar either an Astrologer or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himself calls them. Prophetas, nescio quos, qui Nabonassarum Afircenonum suis in somnis viderunt; Propheti Isteque not who, that in their sleep have dreamt of Nabonassar, that he was an Astrologer.

Whether Nabonassar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintain the negative: But as his being Lord over the Chaldeans, doth not prove him to have been learned in their sciences; so doth it not prove him not to have been also King of Affria. The Emperor Charles the first, who was born in Gent, and Philip his Son, King of Spain, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men far more learned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematics, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then living in Spain, if Spain at that time had any. Yet I think, Posterity will not use this as an argument, to prove that Spain was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabonassar did use the Affrian Soldiers, and Babylonian Scholars; but it seems, that he and his posterity, by giving themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation; lost the richer, out of which they first issued, as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two unanswerable arguments, (as Scaliger terms them, being me thinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alleged on the contrary side) one of them which is drawn from the unlike found and writing of those names, Salmanassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likeness of found, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted, which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some places in the Province of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it self: this indeed might be so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto there is nothing save conjecture. But in that which is alleged out of the Prophet Esay concerning Merodach the son of Baladan; and in that which is said of this Merodach, and Mardokenpadu, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to reign in the first year of Hezekia, I find matter of more difficulty, than can be answered in half. I will therefore defer the handling of these objections until I meet with their subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Merodach lived, and was King. Yet that I may not leave too great a scruple in the mind of the Reader, thus far will I here satisfy him; that how strong soever this argument may seem, Scaliger himself did live to retract it, ingenuously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the son of Nabonassar, he had been deceived.

Now therefore let us consider, in what sort they have fashioned their Story, who taking Pul to be a distinct person from Belosus or Belysiur, have in like sort, as was necessary, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to fall in Ajabudon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I must first confess my want of Books, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present unto us the body of this History, in one view. Divers, indeed, there are, whom I have seen, that since Joseph Scaliger delivered his opinion, have written in favour of some one or other point thereof; but sebas Calosius himself, who hath abridged Scaliger's learned Work, De emendatione Temporum, hath not been careful to give us notice, how long Belosus, Baladan, Pul, or Triglat Palassar did reign; (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Scaliger) but is content to set down Baladan, for the same same person with Nabonassar, which Scaliger himself revoked. In this case therefore I must lay down the plot of these divided Kingdoms, in such sort as I find it conceived by Angustinus Tornilius; who only of all that I have seen, sets down the succession, continuance, and acts of those that reigned in Affria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belosus, and his Posterity, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Tornilius is a Regular Clerk of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annals were printed the last year; he appears to me a man of a curious industry, sound judgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, willfully) forgetful of thanking, or mentioning those Prosperant Writers, by whose Books he hath received good information, and enriched his works by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this business he hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose help, without wrong or dishonour to himself, he hath both used and acknowledged. For mine own part, I will not spare to do right unto Tornilius; but confess my self to have received benefit by his writing; and wish that his Annals had sooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed me in some things, so would he have instructed and emboldened me to write more fully and less timorously in other things, which now I have no leisure to revise. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly delivered, and yet feared lest it had over-hastily passed out of my hand, and been exposed to other mens constructions) of the four Kings that invaded the Valley of Siddim, and were slain by Abraham, I find him adventuring as I have done, to say, that they may probably be thought to have been some petty Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let us consider how he hath ordered these last Affrian and Babylonian Kings. After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces, being the most mighty, fought to get all to himself, but was opposed by Belosus; in which contention, one Phul a powerful man in Affria, sided with Belosus, and they two prevailed so far, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a division thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire between Octavian, Anthony, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Tornilius offers not this, or the rest, as matter of uncertainty) that Arbaces made himself Sovereign Lord of all, and placed the seat of his Empire in Media, appointing Belosus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Affria. But in short space, that is, in four years, it came to pass by the just judgment of God, that Phul and Belosus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus; and instead of being Vice-Roys, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this later opinion Tornilius himself leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposing, resolving to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guess. Having thus devised how Phul and Belosus might, at the first, attain to be Kings, he orders their time and their successors in this manner.

Four years after Arbaces, Phul begins to reign, and continues eight and forty years. Theglathpalasar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diversely, according to the Authors whom I have in hand are pleased to diversify them) succeeding unto Phul, reigned three and twenty. Salmanassar followed him, and reigned ten. After him Senacherib reigned seven: and when he was slain, Asarhaddon his son ten years; in whom that line failed.

The same time that Phul took upon him as King of Affria, or not long after (why not rather afore? for so it had been more likely) Belosus usurped the Kingdom of Babylon, and held it threescore and eight years; at the least threescore and eight years did pass, before Nabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Baladan, are assigned six and twenty years: then two and fifty to Merodach, or Mardokenpadu; four and twenty to Ben Merodach; and lastly, one and twenty to Nabolasar the father of Nebuchodonosor; who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the original of these Affrian and Babylonian Kingdoms, I may truly say, That the conjectures of other men, who give all to Belosus, and confound him with Phul, appear to me more nearly resembling the truth. Neither do I think, that Tornilius would have conceived two different waies, by which Phul might have gotten Affria (for how Belosus came to get Babylon, it is plain enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. He adheres to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceived, that to make Phul on the sudden King of Affria; or to give him so noble a Province, as would, of it self, invite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most unlikely to have happened, unless his defects (whereof we find no mention) had been proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he devised the means, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul being one of the three that divided all between them, was utterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this division it self, and the civil Warres that caused it, were never heard of? Questionless, the enterprising of some treasures by Belofus, with his Judgment, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconveniences can this way be avoyded; but that either we must confesse the Dominion given to Phul to have been exceeding his merits; or else his merits, and name withall, to have been strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make us thinke, that rather the conjecture, inferring such a sequel, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul, and Belofus, against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Assyrians to recover such strength in foure years, as might serve to hold out in rebellion: for Belofus it was needlesse to rebell, considering, that Arbaces did not seek to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an over-great favourer of liberty) even the Medes that were vnder his own Government, to doe what they listed.

But it is now fit that we peruse the Catalogue of these Kings; not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their own times, but speaking of their order and time in generall. If it be soe unlawful to think, that some of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may be true, especially such as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparent likelihood; why then is it said, that Phul did reign in Assyria eight and forty years? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true that painful and judicious Writers have found this number of years to agree fitly with the course of things in History: yet all of them took it from Annius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgery (as questionless he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tels truth, or probability, he be not believed for his own sake; though for our own sakes we make use of his boldness, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) we are unwilling our selves to be Authors of new, though not unprofitable conjectures. Herein we shall have this commodity, that we may without blushing after a little, to help our own opinions, and lay the blame upon Annius, against whom we shall be sure to find friends that will take our part.

The reigns of Theglathabalsar and Salmanassar did reach, by Annius his measure, to the length of five and twenty years the one, and seventeen the other; Tornielus hath cut off two from the former, and seven from the latter of them, to fit (as I think) his own computation; using the liberty whereof I spake last: for that any Author, save our good Metaphenes, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did reign, it is more than I have yet found. To Senaccherib and Asarhadon, Tornielus gives the same length of reign, which is found in Metaphenes. I think there are not many, that will arrogate so much unto themselves, as may very well be allowed unto a man so judicious as is Tornielus; and yet I could wish that he had forbore to condemn the followers of Annius in this business, wherein he himself hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must have done, almost nothing.

The like liberty we find that he used in the measuring the reigns of the Chaldeans, filling up all the space between the end of Sardanapalus and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threecore and eight years of Belofus. In this respect it was, perhaps, that he thought Belofus might have begun his reign somewhat later than Phul: for threecore and eight years would seem a long time for him to hold a Kingdom, that was no young man when he took possession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shortning his reign, seeing his life reacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone without adding the time wherein he was a private man, enough for a long liver? Indeed eight and forty years had been somewhat of the most, considering that he seems by the story to have been a little less at such time as he joyined with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty years, did well deserve that note (which Tornielus adviſedly gives) that if his reign extended not so far, then the reign of such as came after him, occupied the middle time, unto Nabonassar.

I neither do reprehend the boldness of Tornielus, in conjecturing, nor the modesty of Scaliger and Setius Calvisius, in forbearing to set down as warrantable, such things as depend onely upon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from us by Antiquity, must be described in in History, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countreys, whereof as yet there is made no true discovery, that is, either by leaving some part blank, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks of Load-stone, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Rivers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrary to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from distance of place, allows not such liberty to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remediless oblivion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith.

— Neque seruidis
Pars inclusa caloribus
Mundi, nec Boreæ finitibus latus, Durat æque sole Nives,
Marecatorem abigunt, horrida callidi
Vincunt æquora Navita,

Nor Southern heat, nor Northern Snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The subjects Regions can fence,
And keep the greedy Merchant thence:
The subtle Shipmen way to find,
Storm never so the Seas with Wind.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe serve only to mis-lead such discoverers as rashly believe them; drawing upon the publishers, either some angry curses or well deserved scorn; but to keep their owne credit, they cannot serve always. To which purpose I remember a pretty jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spanish gentleman, who had been employed by his King in planting a Colony upon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked, him being then my Prisoner, some questions about an Island in those Streights, which, me thought, might have done either benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wives Island; saying, That whilst the fellow drew that Map, his wife sitting by, desired to put in one Countrey for hers that she in imagination, might have an Island of her own. But in filling up the blankes of old Histories, we need not be soe scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time shall runne backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appear ridiculous: What if some good Copy of any ancient Author, could be found, shewing (if we have it not already) the perfect truth of these uncertainties: would it be more shame to have believed in the mean while, Annius or Tornielus, than to have believed nothing? Here I will not say, that the credit which we gave to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be given to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Tornielus, than Annius, yet him than them, of his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seems to me; it having moreover gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions as have once gotten the credit of being general, so to deal as Pacruvius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senators of the City to death. He lockt the Senators up within the State-house, and offered the lives of the Peoples mercy; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, untill the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hasty: for as fast as every name was read, all the town cried, Let him dye: but the execution required more leisure; for in substituting of another, some notorious vice of the person, or baseness of his condition, or sufficiency of his quality, made each new one that was offered to be rejected: so that finding the worse and less choice, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lack of better.

§. V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

AFTER the division of the Assyrian Empire, follows the instauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reign of the same King Degeta and in his one and fiftieth year. It is, I know, the general opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Jotham: yet is not that opinion so general, but that Authors, weighty enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things unto the sacred History, which are found in prophane Authors, we should not be too careful of drawing the Hebrews to those works of time, which had no reference to their affairs, it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of accounts, we joyne them to matters of Israel and Juda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian games and exercises of activity, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured measured the length of the race by his own foot; by which Pythagoras found out the state and likely strength of Hercules his body. They took name, not from the Mountain Olympus, but from the City Olympia, otherwise Pisa, near unto Elis; where also Jupiter's Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the Wonders of the World, was known by the name of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from every fourth year compleat, in the plains of Elis, a City of Peloponnesus, near the River Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many years, till Iphitus, by advice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Licurgus the Law-giver then living: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the reign of Theodosius the Emperour, according to Cedrenus: others think that they were dissolved under Constantine the Great.

From this institution, Varro accompted the Grecian times and their stories to be certain: but reckoned all before, either doubtful or fabulous: and yet Pliny gives little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reign of Cyrus, who began in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Ensebius out of Diodore, Cassor, Polybins, and others, hath gathered, in whose time the seven wise Grecians flourished. For Solon had speech with Craesus, and Craesus was overthrown and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing brains have laboured to find out the certain beginning of these Olympiads, namely, to set them in the true year of the World, and the reign of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first account, that is, of the Worlds year, they can hardly jump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyrius against Julian and Dydimus begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Ostas, or Anasiah.

Ensebius, who is contrary to himself in this reckoning, accounts with those that find the very first Olympiad in the beginning of the four hundredth and sixth year after Troy; yet he telleth us that it was in the fiftieth year of Uzziah, which is (as I find it) two years later.

Erastosthenes placeth the first Olympiad four hundred and seven years after Troy, reckoning the years that passed between; to whom Dionysius, Halicarnassensis, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The distance between the destruction of Troy and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Erastosthenes. From the taking of Troy to the descent of Hercules his posterity into Pe- loponnesus, were fourscore years; thence to the Ionian expedition, threescore years; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his government in Sparta, one hundred fifty nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eight years. In this account the first year of the first Olympiad is not included.

But vain labour it were to seek the beginning of the Olympiads by numbing the years from the taking of Troy, which is of date far more uncertain. Let it suffice that by knowing the instauration of these games to have been in the four hundredth and eighth year current after Troy, we may reckon back to the taking of that City, setting that, and other accidents which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads must needs teach us how to find when they began.

To this good use we have, the ensuing years unto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided by the same Erastosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads to the passage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundredth fourscore and seventeen years; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, eight and forty years; forwards to the victory of Lyfander, seven and twenty; to the battel of Leuctra, thirty four; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, five and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole sum ariseth to 453 years; which number he otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth year of Uzziah, we have arguments grounded upon that which is certain, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his reign, and the death of Alexander; as also upon the Astronomical calculation of sundry Eclipses of the Sun; as of that which happened when Xerxes set out of Sardis with his Army to invade Greece; and of divers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reign as King before he was Lord of the great Monarchy, began the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he reigned thirty years: they who give him but twenty nine years of reign (following Herodotus rather than Tully, Justin, Ensebius, and others) begin a year later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by all good Writers in the first year of the hundredth and fourteenth Olympiad. This latter note of Alexander's death serveth well to lead us back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like observations do. For if we reckon upwards from the time of Alexander, and we shall find all to agree with the years of the Olympiads; wherein Cyrus began his reign, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdoms) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, unto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundredth and twelfth Olympiad, we find two hundred and thirty years compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchy, which lasted but seven years, we find compleat two hundred and seven years, which was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first year of Cyrus his Monarchy (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundredth and fortieth year from the institution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seventy years of the captivity of Juda, and desolation of the Land of Israel: manifest it is, that we must reckon back those seventy years, and one hundred threescore, and ten years more, the last which passed under the Kings of Juda, to find the first of these Olympiads, which by this account is the one and fiftieth of Uzziah, as we have already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serve well to the same purpose. For examples sake; that which was seen when Xerxes mustered his Army at Sardis, in the two hundredth threescore and seventh year of Nabonassar, being the last of the threescore and fourteenth Olympiad, leads us back unto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we have a fair way through the threescore and ten years unto the destruction of Jerusalem; and so upwards through the reigns of the last Kings of Juda, to the one and fiftieth year of Uzziah.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein the first Olympiad began.

To tell the great solemnity of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece, they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wrestling, Fighting; and the like. Neither did they only contend for the Mastery in those feats, whereof there was good use, but in running of Chariots fighting with whorle-bars, and other the like ancient kinds of exercises that served only for ostentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable quality, to make trial of their skill. Yea, the very Cryers which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them should get the honour of having plaid the best part.

The Eleans were presidents of those Games, whose justice, in pronouncing without partiality who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palm, or Olive, without any other commodity following than the reputation. Indeed there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diagoras had seen his three sons crowned for their several victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Adoree, Diagoras, non enim in calum affensus es, that is, Die, Diagoras, for thou shalt not climb up to heaven: as if there could be no greater happiness on earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like sense Horace speaks of these Victors, calling them.

Quos Elea dominum reducit Palma Caelestis.

Such as like heavenly wights do come
With an Elean Garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had won these Olympian prizes; but even grave Historians thought it a matter worthy of their noting. Such was (as Tully counts it) the vanity of the Greeks, that they esteemed it almost as great an honour to have won the victory at Running or wrestling in those games, as to have triumphed in Rome for some famous victory, or conquest of a Province.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moon; and upon the fifteenth day of the Month Hecatombæon, which doth answer to our June; and what means they used to make the Month begin with the new Moon, that the fifteenth day might be the full, I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now return unto the Kings of Juda, and leave the merry Greeks at their games, whom I shall meet in more serious employments, when the Persian quarrels draw the body of the History into the coasts of Ionis and Hellepont.

§. VI.

Of Jotham and his Contemporaries.

Jotham the sonne of Uzziah, when he was five and twenty years old, and in the second of Pekahs King of Israel, was anointed King in Jerusalem, his Father yet living. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple of threescore cubits upright, and therefore called Ophe: besides divers Cities in the Hills

1 Kings. 15.

Hills of Judea, and in the Forrest, Towers and Palaces: he enforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundred talents, and of Wheat and Barly two thousand measures: he reigned fix and twenty years: of whom Josephus gives this testimony: Ejusmodi verò Princeps hic fuit, ut nullam in eo virtutis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo Pie colerit, hominibus suis adeo iusto preseruit, urbem ipsam tanta sibi cura esse passus sit, & tantopere auxerit, ut universum regnum hostibus quidem minime contemnendum, domesticis autem ejus incolis atque civibus felix: justum & fortunatum sua virtute effecerit. This was such a Prince, as a man could find no kind of vertue wanting in him: he worshipped God so religiously, he governed his men so righteously, he was so provident for the City, and did so greatly amplify it, that by his vertue and prowess he made his whole Kingdom not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Servants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happy.

This is all that I find of Joatham: his reign was not long, but as happy in all things, as he himself was devout and vertuous.

Auchomen about this time succeeded Phelstus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which governed from year to year. And yet Pausanias in his second book with Strabo & Plutarch in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was governed by Kings of the race of the Bacidae, to the time of Cypselus, who drove them out.

Teglatphalassar, or Teglatpileser, the son of Phul the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that was of this new race, about this time invaded Israel, while Pekah (who murdered his master Pekiah) was King thereof. In which expedition he took most of the Cities of Nephthali and Galilee, with those of Gilead over Jordan, and carried the inhabitants captive. This Tiglat reigned five and twenty years, according to Metaphenses. But Krentzheimius finds, that with his son Salmanassar he reigned yet two years longer; which years I would not ascribe to the son, because the Aera of Nabonassar begins with his single reign, but reckon them to Tiglat Phalassar himself, who therein reigned 27 years.

Alcibiades, the son of Agamemnon, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled 25 years. Alcarnenes governed Sparta: after whom, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius. But therein surely Eusebius is mistaken: for Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witness the contrary. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and reigned 60 years, and out-lived the Messenians war: which was ended by Theopompus, the son of Nicanor, his royal companion.

At this time lived Nabum the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the city of Nineve, which succeeded (saith Josephus) a hundred and fifteen years after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sofarsmus and Medidus reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

Achaz, or Achaz, succeeded unto Joatham in the seventeenth year of Pekah, the son of Remalia: the same being also the last year of his fathers reign, who began in the second of the same Pekah, and reigned 16, but not complete years. This Achaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his son for sacrifice before the Idol Moloch, or Saturn which was represented by a man-like brazen body, bearing the head of a Calf, set up not far from Jerusalem, in a valley shadowed with Woods, called Gebinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gebennus is used for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carcasses of this Idol, and as the fire encircled, so the sacrificers, with a noise of Cymbals, and other Instruments, filled the ayrs to the end the pittifull cries of the children might not be heard: which unnatural, israel, and devilish Oblation, Jeremy the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome upon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leviticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible fire was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomy, it is called an abomination which God hateth: That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Judea, divers Authors witness; as Virgil in the second of Æneids—Sanguine Placasti, &c. and Silius—Postere cede Deos. Saturn is said to have brought this custom into Italy, besides the casting of many souls into the River of Tyber, in stead of which, Hercules commanded, that the waxen Images of men should be thrown in and drowned. The Devil also taught the Carthaginians this kind of butchery, in so much, that when their City was besieged, and in distress, the Priest made them believe, that because they had spared their own children, and had bought and brought up others to be offered, that therefore Saturn had stirred up and strengthened their Enemies

Enemies against them: whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest youths of their City to be slain, and offered to Saturn or Satan, to appease him: who besides these forenamed Nations, had instructed the Rhodian, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Messene, of Galatia, with the Massagetes, and others, in these his services. Further, as if he were not content to destroy the souls of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, (as Acosta writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Devil unto this fearful servitude, in which he alloweth the Floridians and Virginians at this day.

For the wickedness of this King Achaz, God stirred up Rezin of Damascus, and Pekah the Son of Remaliah, King of Israel against him, who invaded Judea, and besieged Jerusalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, posselt himself of Elah by the Red Sea, and cast the Jezes out of it; and Pekah slaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thousand Judeans, of the ablest of the Kingdom, at which time Maasiah, the Sonne of Achaz, was also slain by Rezin, with Azrikam the Governor of his house, and Eleanath the second person unto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Israelites lead away to samaria: but by the counsell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and delivered back again.

As Israel and Aram vexed Juda on the North, so the Edomites and the Philistines, who evermore attended the ruine of Judea, entred upon them from the South, and took Bethsemer, Ajalon, Gaderoth, Shobcho, Tinnab, and Gemoze, slew many people, and carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Achaz saw himself environed on all sides, and that his Idols and dead gods gave him no comfort, he sent to the Assyrian Tiglatpileser, to desire some aid from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him with the silver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings house.

Tiglatpileser wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the trouble that rose in Palestina. His Father having lately made himself from a Provincial Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Assyria, had a little before led him the way into Judea, invited by Atanabem, King of Israel. Wherefore now the Son willingly harkened to Achaz, and embraced the advantage. As for Belochur himself, he was content to assign some other time for going through with this enterprise: because (as I have said before) he was not firmly settled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in men and fame. But Tiglat, having now, with the treasures of Jerusalem, prepared his Army, first invaded the Territory of Damascus, wan the City, and killed Rezin the last of the race of the Adadis, who began with David, & ended with this Achaz. At Damascus, Achaz met Tiglat, and taking thence a pattern of the Altar, sent it to Tribal the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Jerusalem, whereon at his return he burnt Sacrifice to the gods of the Syrians.

In the mean while Tiglat posselt all Babylon, and the rest beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse. And then passing the River, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdom of Israel, and made them his Vassals. And notwithstanding that he was invaded and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoil of Israel, he posselt himself of the greater part of Juda, and, as it seemeth, enforced Achaz to pay him tribute. For in the second of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechia, that he revolted from Assur, or rebelled against him, and therefore was invaded by Sennacherib. After Achaz had beheld and born these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth year of his reign he died; but was not buried in the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda.

With Achaz lived Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who governed 40 years, saith Eusebius: Diodorus and Ctesius find Anticarminus instead of this Medidus, to have been Sofarsmus his successor, to whom they give 50 years.

Tiglat Pileser held the Kingdom of Assyria, all the reign of Achaz: yet so, that Salmanassar his Son may seem to have reigned with him some part of the time. For we find that Achaz did send unto the Kings of Abur to help him. The Geneva note says, that these Kings of Abur, were Tiglat Pileser, and those Kings that were under his Dominion. But that he or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might give him the Lordship over other Kings, I do neither find any History, nor circumstance that proveth. Wherefore I think that these Kings of Abur, were Tiglat, and Salmanassar his Son, who reigned with his Father, as hath been said before: though how long he reigned with his Father, it had been hard to define.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedæmon, a hundred and thirty years after Lycurgus, according to Plutarch. Eusebius makes their beginning far later, namely, in the fiftieth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first; Theopompus and Polydorus being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen every year, were controllers, as well of their Senators, as of their Kings, nothing being done without their advice and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Abaz died Æschylus, who had ruled in Athens ever since the fiftieth year of Vorgia. Alcemenon the thirteenth of the Mc-dontide, or Governors of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) succeeded his Father Æschylus, and was the last of their Governors: he ruled only two years. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Governors for life; which ending in this Alcemenon, they erected a Magistrature, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burgho-Master, or Governour of their City for ten years.

This alteration Pausanias in his fourth Book begins in the first year of the eight Olympiad, Ensebius and Halicarnassæus in the first of the seventh Olympiad: at which time indeed, Carops the first of these, began his ten years rule.

The Kingdom of the Latines, governed about three hundred year by the Silvii, of the race of Æneas, took end in the same Abaz time: the foundation of Rome being laid by Romulus and Remus in the eighth year of the same King, Codoman builds it in the eleventh of Abaz. Euchobæus in the eighth, as I think he should; others somewhat later, and in the reign of Ezechias, Cicero, Eutropius, Orosius, and others square the time of the foundation to the third year of the sixth Olympiad. But Halicarnassæus, Solinus Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Ensebius, to the first year of the seventh; who seem not only to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to have kept herein the best account.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the Antiquity of Italy, and foundation of Rome in the time of Abaz.

§. I.

Of the Inhabitants, and the name of Italy.

AND here to speak of the more ancient times of Italy, and what Nations posselt it before the arrival of Æneas, the place may seem to invite us: the rather because much fabulous matter hath been mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italy before the fall of Troy, was known to the Greeks by divers names: as first Hesperia, then Aufonia, the one name arising of the seat, the other of the Aufones, a people inhabiting part of it; the one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotrii, whom Halicarnassæus, thinks to have been the first that brought a Colony of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italy of Italus; concerning which, changes of names, Virgil speaks thus:

*Est locus, Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt,
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere gleba:
Oenotrii coluere olim, nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.*

There is a Land which Greeks Hesperia name, Ancient, and strong, of much fertility:
Oenotrians held it, but we hear by fame,

That by late ages of Posterity,
Tis from a Captains name call'd Italy.

Who this Captain or King may have bin, it is very uncertain. For Virgil speaks no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued so long upon the whole Country, and worn out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to find out the original of this name, and the first planters of this noble Country, Reyneccius hath made a very painful search, and not improbable conjecture. And first of all he grounds upon that of Halicarnassæus, italicus, who speaks of a Colony which the Eleans did lead into Italy, before the name of Italy was given to it; Secondly, upon that of Justinus, who saith, that Brundisium was a Colony of the Ælians; Thirdly, upon that of Strabo, who affirms the same of Temesa or Tempha, a City of the Brutii in Italy; Lastly, upon the authority of Pliny, who shews that the Italians did inhabit only one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was derived over all. Concerning that which is said of the Eleans and Ælians who

Strabo lib. 6.

who (as he shews) had one original; from them he brings the name of Italy. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Aitolia, save that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greek words is common; and the letter (o) is changed into (a) which change is found in the name of Æthalia an Island near Italy, peopled by the Ætholians; and the like changes are very familiar in the Æolic Dialect; of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Ætholians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius Halicarnassæus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach.

Hereunto appertains that of Julian the Apostata, who called the Greeks cousins of the Latines. Also the common Original of the Greeks and Latines from Javan; and the Fable of Javus, whose Image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italy lay, and was stamped on Coins, with a Ship on the other side; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Javan, father of the Greeks and Latines; who sailing over the Ionian Sea, that lies between Ætholia and the Western parts of Greece and Italy, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reyneccius thinks, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, &c. thereto applies that of Berosus, who called Cethim, Italus; though it may seem strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whilst he abode in Italy with Eleëtra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, easily disproved. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moses; and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kittim, then was he the son of Javan, and Nephew of Japheth, the eldest son of Noah: which antiquity far exceeds the time of Italy, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Country, not long before the War of Troy.

Likewise Virgil, who speaks of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Eleëtra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italy, but calleth Eleëtra and her sister Asia (poetically) daughters of the Mountain in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigines; which he would not have done, had Atlas and Italus been one person.

As for the authority of Berosus in this case, we need the less to regard it, for that Reyneccius himself, whose conjectures are more to be valued than the dreams wherewith Annius hath filled Berosus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italy began long after Atlas, it appears by the verses of Virgil last rehearsed, wherein he would not have said, Nunc fama minores Italiam dixisse ducis de nomine gentem, had that name been heard of ere Dardanus left the Country, But seeing that, when Hercules, who died a few years before the War of Troy, had left in Italy a Colony of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Ætholians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pausanias teach) then the name of Italy began; and seeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldness to say, that Italus was Commander of these Eleans. For though I remember not that I have read of any such Greek as was named Italus; yet the name of Ætolus written in Greek Aitolus, was very famous among the Ætholians, and among the Eleans, he being son of a King of Elis, and founder of the Ætholian Kingdom. Neither is it more hard to derive the name of Italus from Ætolus, than Italia from Ætholia. So may Virgil's authority stand well with the collections of Reyneccius; the name of Italy being taken both from a Captain, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

§. II.

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italy the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous; the Hetrurians having held the greatest part of it under their subjection; and the Latines by the virtue and felicity of the Romans, who were a branch of them, subduing all Italy, and in a few ages whatsoever Nation was known in Europe: together with all the Western parts of Asia, and North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnassæus, Varro, and Reyneccius (following them) think to have bin Arcadians; and this name of Aborigines (to omit other significations that are strained) imports as much as Original, or Native of the place, which they possessed: which title the Arcadians are known in vaunting manner to have always usurped, fetching their antiquity from beyond the Moon; because indeed, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponnesus enforced to forsake their seats so oft as other Greeks were, who did dwell without that halfe Island, neither had the Arcadians so unsure a dwelling as the rest of the Peloponnesians, because their Country was less fruitful in land, mountainous, and hard of access, and they themselves

(as in such places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of these therefore having occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, stile themselves Aborigenes, in that language, which either their new Seat, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might be that the Arcadians, who dwelt somewhat farr from the Sea, and are alwaies noted as unapt men to prove good Mariners, should have bin Authors of new discoveries, were a question not easie to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitlesse of children, in which those ages abounded, inforced the superfluous company to seek another seat, & that some expeditions of the Arcadians, as especially that of Evander, into the same parts of Italy, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigenes, were the Pelagii, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gave name to all Greeces: but their antiquities are long since dead, for lacke of good records. Neither was their glory such in Italy, as could long sustaine the name of their owne Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Anjones, Arunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturnus was brought to some civility; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturnus S. Augustine calleth Stercor or Sterculinus, others term him Stercutius, and say, that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium took his name of Saturnus, because he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Jupiter, it is questionles a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanity to think that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fled from another; so in the truth of History, it is well known, that no King reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it should be hard to find one Country or another, wherein a man might be safe from his pursuit. And yet, as most fables and poetical fictions were occasioned by some ancient truth, which either by ambiguity of speech, or some allusion, they did mainely and darkly expresse (for so they feigned a passage over a River in Hell, because death is a passage to another life: and because this passage is hateful, lamentable, and painfull, therefore they named the River Styx, of hate; Cocytus of lamentation, and Acheron, of Pain: so also because men are stonie-hearted; and because the Greek word, people, and laos, tones, are neer in found, therefore they feigned in the time of Ducalion stones converted into men, as at other times men into stones: in like manner it may be, that the original of Saturnus hiding himself was some allusion to that old opinion of the wisest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Aëtii; whence also Esay of the true God saies, tu Deus absconditus. For it cannot be in vain, that the word Saturnus should also have this very signification, if it be derived (as some think) from the Hebrew Satur, which is to hide: Howbeit I deny not but that the original of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought elsewhere.

Reynecius doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who defended of Cethim, the Son of Javan, were the men who gave the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembered by Homer as aiders of the Trojans in their war. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crown of Troy. Hereupon Reynecius gathers, that their abode was in Asia: viz. in agro Elaitico, in the Elaitian Territory, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a City which the Eoliens held in Asia, called Elaa, or Elaita, Pausanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidemis, or (according to the Greek writing) Cidamis, which name last rehearsed hath a very neer sound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greek Letter (D) having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (Th) differing only in the strength or weakness of utterance, which is found between many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans, being descended of Cethim, Citim, or Kittim, the Son of Javan, who was Progenitor of the Greeks, might very well take a denomination from the City, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Eleiter, or Elaiter, it is very likely, considering that among the Arcadians, Thocians, Etolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Eolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountain Elaus, the Haven Elaen, the people Elaitae, the City Elaeus, Elaita, and Elaitaia; of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elaitini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetei and Arcadians, had their original from Cethim, it is nothing unlikely, that agreeing in language & similitude of names, they might nevertheless differ in found and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriving the Sabinus from him) give the name of Sabus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatius (of which name they had a Prince that founded the City Elateja) be named of the Ceteans Latinius. Reynecius, pursuing this likelihood, thinks that when Euripylus, Lord of the Ceteans, (being the Son of Telephus, whom Hercules begat upon Ange, the daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia) was slain by Achilles in the Trojan War: then did Telephus, brother to Euripylus, conduct the Ceteans, who (fearing what evil might befall themselves by the Greeks, if the affairs of Troy should go ill) passed into that part of Italy, whereas the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrius. And Reynecius farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his Grand-mother Ange, an Arcadian Lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elatius, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatinus, and then Latinius. That this name of Elatius may have bin taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Iphidas, the other of Elatius, who were Sons of Aras King of Arcadia, which gave name to the Country: and between these two families the succession in that Kingdom did pass, almost interchangeably, for many ages, till at the end of the Trojan war it fell into the hand of Hippoborus of the race of Elatius, in whose Posterity it continued untill the last. Again, the name of Latinius, having a derivative found, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the conjecture of Reynecius, which if he made over-boldly, yet others may follow it with the less reproof, considering that it is not easie to find either an apparent truth, or fair probability among these disagreeing Authors, which have written the originals of Latinius.

§. VI.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines untill Aeneas his coming.

The Kings which reigned in Latium before the arrival of Aeneas, were Saturnus, Picus, Faunus, & Latinius. Of Saturnus there is nothing remembered, save what is mentioned already, and many Fables of the Greeks, which whether they be applyable to this man, it is for him to judge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturn of the Greeks called by them Chronos, or some other, stiled Saturn by the Aborigenes. For the age wherein he lived, may very well admit of him to have bin the same: but the names of Stercor, and Stercutius (for it may be, this name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the foil the idols which they laid on their grounds had that of the appellation from him) do rather make him seem some other man.

Of Picus it is said, that he was a good horse-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Py, may well seem (as it is interpreted) to have grown from the skill which he had in sooth-saying, or divination, by the flight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Son of Picus, reigned after his Father: He gave to Evander the Arcadian (who having slain by mischance his father Echeneus King of Arcadia, fled into Italy) the walled grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fatna, the sister of Faunus, who was also his wife, as all Historians agree, she was held a Prophetess, and highly commended for her chastity, which praise in her must needs have bin much blemished by her marriage, it self being merely incestuous. It is not mentioned that Faunus, had by his sister any child, neither do we read of any other Wife which he had, save only that Virgil gives unto him Latina as his Son, by a Nymph called Marica.

But who this Marica was, it is not found, save onely that her abode was about the River Liris near Minturne.

Of the name Latinius, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted four: one, the Son of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Ulysses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice only of the second, of whom he saith, that his name was Telephus; and the people anciently named the Ceti, were from his surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reynecius, the difference consisting almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus the son of Hercules, whereas Reynecius makes him his Nephew, by a son of the same name. This Latinius having obtained the succession in that Kingdom after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter and Heir Latina, to Turnus the son of Venilia, who was sister to Amata Latinius his Wife.

But when Aeneas arrived in those parts with fifteen ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be embarked, according to the rate which Thucydides allows to the Vessels then used, about one thousand & two hundred men: then Latinius finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance, with the Trojan, and moved with the great reputation of Aeneas, which himself had heard of in the war of Troy, gave his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus: who incensed herewith, fought to avenge himself by war: which was soon ended with his own death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certain, that were she an Italian, she could not have born a Daughter marriageable at the arrival of Aeneas; unless we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italy, to Telephus the Father, than to his Son, who served in the last year of the Trojan War. But Reyneccius holds her an Asiaticque, and thinks withall, that Lavinia was born before Telephus came into Italy. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnassensis call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seem by Varro's who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be derived from the Greek name Palas. Amata, which signifieth beloved, or dear, was the name by which the High Priest called every Virgin whom he took to serve as a Nun of Vesta; wherefore it is the more easie to be thought a surname, howsoever Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister. Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being given in marriage to Aeneas, the Kingdom of Latium, or the greatest part of that Country, was established in that race: wherein it continued until it was overgrown by the might and greatness of the Romans.

§. IV.

Of Aeneas, and of the Kings and Governours of Alba.

AENEAS himself being of the Royal blood of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Trojans. By his Wife Cressa, the daughter of Priamus, he had a son called Aecianus; whose surname was Julius, having before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) been surnamed Iulus. But when Aeneas was dead, his Wife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Aecianus, fled into the Woods, where she was delivered of a son, called thereupon Sylvius, and surnamed Posthumus, because he was born after his fathers Funeral. This flight of Lavinia was so civil taken by the people, that Aecianus procured her return, entreated her honourably, and using her as a Queen, did foster her young son his half-brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, whether to avoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place, Aecianus leaving to his mother in law the City Latini, which Aeneas had built and called after his new Wives name, founded the City Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his reign was according to some, eight and twenty years: Virgil gives him thirty; others five and thirty, and eight and thirty. After his decease, there arose contention between Sylvius, the son of Aeneas, and Julius the son of Aecianus, about the Kingdom: but the people inclining to the son of Lavinia, Julius was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdom to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posterity were afterwards called Sylvii.

The reign of the Alban Kings, with the continuance of each mans reign, I find thus set down:

1	Sylvius Posthumus .	29
2	Sylvius Aeneas .	31
3	Sylvius Latinus .	50
4	Sylvius Alba .	39
5	Sylvius Atis .	26
6	Sylvius Capys .	28
7	Sylvius Capetus .	13
8	Sylvius Tiberinus .	8 years.
9	Sylvius Agrippa .	41
10	Sylvius Aladinus .	19
11	Sylvius Aventinus .	37
12	Sylvius Procas .	23
13	Sylvius Amulius .	44
	Sylvius Numitor .
	Itha , called also Ibea and Sylvia .
	Romulus Remus .

The most of these Kings lived in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Towns in the borders of Latium: who standing much upon the honour of their original, grew thereby to be called Prixi Latini. Of Tiberinus some think that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the coming of Aeneas into Italy. The Mountain Aventinus had name (as many write) from Aventinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Julius the brother of Aventinus, is named by Ensebius as father of another Julius, and grandfather of Julius Proculus, who leaving Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome: Numitor, the elder son of Procas, was deprived of his Kingdom by his brother Amulius; by whom also his son Agrippa was slain, and Itha his daughter made a Nun of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceived two sons, either by her Uncle Amulius, as some think; or by Mars, as the Poets feign; or perhaps by some man of war. Both the children, their Uncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quick, according to the law; which

§. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus birth and death.

OF Rome, which devoured the Alban Kingdom, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat uncertain) depend much upon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numitor, the last that reigned in Alba. For how not only the bordering people, but all Nations between Euphrates and the Ocean, were broken in pieces by the iron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be described in one place, having been the work of many Ages; whereof I now do handle only the first, as incident unto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Portius Cato, Calpurnius Piso, Sempronius and others, seek to derive the Romans from Jannus; but Herodotus, Marcellus, and many others of equal credit, give the Gracians for their Ancestors: and as Strabo strab. 5. bo reporteth in his fifth Book, Cæcilius re-f. 159. rum Romanarum Scriptor, eo argumento colligit, Romanos à Græcis esse conditam, quod Romani Græcorum, antiquo instituto, Herculem sacrum faciunt: matrem quoque Evandri venerantur Romanos; Cæcilius (saith he) a Roman Historiographer, doth by this Argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, because the Romans, after Greekish fashion, by ancient ordinance, do sacrifice to Hercules: the Romans also worship the mother of Evander.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembereth many Founders of that City: as Romanus the son of Ulysses and Circes; Romus the son of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who drove the Tuscan out of that Country, built it. Solinus bestows the honour of building Rome upon Evander, saying, That it was beforetimes called Valentia. Heraclides gives the denomination to a captive Lady, brought thither by the Gracians: others say, That it was anciently called Februs, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars; witness S. Augustine in his third Book de Civitate Dei. But Livie will have it to be the work of Romulus, even from the foundation: of whom and his comfort, Juvenal to a Roman Citizen, vaunting of their original, answered in these Verses:

Majorum quisquis primus fuit ille torum,
Aut pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.*

Yet

Yet though thou fetch thy pedigree so far;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepherd was, or else, that I'll forbear meaning, either a Shepherd or a Thief.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preservation, it is said, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars supposed to be his father; that he was nurs'd by a Wolf, found and taken away by Fausula a Shepherds wife. The same unnatural nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch saith, it is like enough that Amulius came covered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: and therein it seemeth to me that he might have two purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heir of his elder brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdom; the other, to satisfy his appetite, because she was fair and goodly. For the being made a Nun of the goddess Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to break her chastity. I also find in Faucher his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Meroüez, King of the Franks, was begotten by a Monster of the Sea: but Faucher says, Let them believe it that list; ille croira qui vovra: Also of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poetical inventions: But to answer these imaginations in general, It is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were Kings, or passions of the mind, or as there were of vices and virtues, then did many women greatly born, cover such slips as they made, by protecting to be forced by more than humane power: so did Oenone consents to Paris, that she had been ravished by Apollo. And Anchyses boasted that he had known Venus. But Rhea was made with child by some man of War, or other, and therefore called Mars, the god of battel, according to the sense of the time. Oenone was overcome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Meroüez might fancy a Sea-Captain, to be gotten with young by such a one: as the Daughter of Utrachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Encas was a bastard, and begotten upon some fair Harlot, called for her beauty Venus, and was therefore the child of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nurs'd by a Wolf, which was Lupa, or Lupina; for the Curtesians in those dayes were called Wolves, que nunc (saith Halicarnassus), honestiori vocabulo antice appellatur; which are now by an honest name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken up into heaven, or rather out of the world, by his father Mars, in a great form of thunder and lightning: so was it said that Encas vanished away by the River Numicus: but thereof Livie also speaketh modestly; for he rehearseth the other opinion that the storm was the fury of the Senators, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking up; and many Authors agree, that there was an unnatural darkness, both at his birth, and at his death; and that he might be slain by thunder or lightning, it is not unlikely. For the Emperor Anastatius was slain with lightning; so was Strabo the Father of Pompey slain with a thunder-bolt: so Carnus the Emperor (who succeeded Probus) whilst he lodged with his Army upon the River Tygris, was there slain with lightning. But a Mars of the same Kind might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of War, and by violence destroyed. And that he died by violence (which destiny followed most of the Roman Emperours) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus, who was the seventh King after him: who when he had murdered his Father-in-law, commanded that he should not be buried, for (saith he) Romulus himself died and was not buried. But let Halicarnassus end this dispute; whose words are these: They (saith he) who dream nearest to the truth, say that he was slain by his own Citizens; and that his cruelties in punishment of offenders, together with his arrogancy, were the cause of his slaughter. For it is reported, that both when his mother was ravished, whether by some man, or by a god, the whole body of the Sun was eclipsed, and all the earth covered with darkness like unto night; and that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, doth contain (besides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a few miles, which had soon been forgotten, if the Roman greatness built upon that foundation, had not given it memory in all ages following, even unto this day. A valiant man he was, very strong of body, patient of travel, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the use of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, and neglect to revenge the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdom, that he himself might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He reigned 37. years, first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death, single, till he was slain, as is already shewed: after which time, the Sovereignty fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him unknown, and more Priest-like than King-like:

like: wherein Rome it self in her latter times hath somewhat resembled this King. For having long bin sole Governess, till Constantinople shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greek Emperour was crushed by foreign enemies, and the Latines dispoyle of Imperial power, the fell into the subjection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheep-hook to the Sword, and therewith vi-gorious to excessive magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being driven from luxury to defensive arms, and therein having bin unfortunate, at length betakes her self again to the Crozier staff.

And thus much of Rome in this place, by occasion of the story of the times of King Abaz, during whose reign in Jury, the foundations of this famous City were laid.

CHAP. XXV.

Of Ezechia, and his Contemporaries.

S. I.

Of the beginning of Ezechias, and of the agreeing of Ptolemy, Nabonassar, Nabopolassar, and Mardocempadus, with the history of the Bible.

AS the first year of Abaz his reign was confounded with the last of his father Jotham, so was the later end of his sixteen years taken up in the three first of Ezechias his son. This appears by the Reign of Hofea, over Israel, which began in the twelfth of Abaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Abaz his fourteenth. But the third of Hofea was the first of Ezechia; so it follows, that Ezechia began to reign in this Fathers fourteenth year. Like enough it is, that the third year of Hofea, the same being the fourteenth of Abaz, was almost spent when Ezechia began, and so the fifteenth year of Abaz may have been concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezechia.

By supposing that Hofea began his Kingdom, when the twelfth year of Abaz was almost compleat, some would find the means how to dis-join the first of Ezechia from the fifteenth of Abaz, placing him yet one year later, of which year, Abaz may perhaps have lived not many days. But seeing that the fourteenth and fifteenth years of Ezechia may not be removed out of their places, it is vain labour to alter the first year.

In the fourteenth year of Ezechia, Sennacherib, invaded Juda and the Countries adjoining, lost his Army by a miraculous stroak from Heaven, fled home, and was slain. The year following it was that God added sixteen years to the life of Ezechia, when he had already reigned fourteen of his nine and twenty: and the same year was that miracle seen of the Suns going back; of which vvonder (as I hear) one Eurtholomew Scalliet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomy, hath by calculation found the very day, which answered unto the twenty fifth of April, in the Julian year, being then Thursday. I have not seen any vvorks of Scalliet; but surely to find a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessary that he produce some record of observation made at such a time. Howsoever it be, the fifteenth year of Ezechia agreed upon; and therefore vve may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is usual in like cases, that Abaz slept with his Fathers, & Ezechia his Son reigned in his stead, it doth no more prove that Ezechia reigned not vvith his Father, than the like saying doth infer the like at the death of Jehosaphat, and succession of Jehoram; vvhereof, as concerning the beginning of the Son to reign vv whilst his Father lived, vve have already said enough. Of this godly King Ezechia, vve find, that his very beginning testified his devotion and zeale. For vv whether it were so, that his unfortunate and ungracious father (who had out vvorn his reputation) gave vvay to his Sons proceedings, vv which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather think) of the first year and first month of his reign, wherein Ezechias opened the doors of the Temple, vv were to be understood as the beginning of his sole government; vv we plainly find it to have been his first vvork, that he opened the doors of the house of the Lord, vv which Abaz had shut up, cleansed the City and Kingdom of the Idols, restored the Priests to their offices and estates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had bin for many years neglected, and brake down the brazen serpent of Moses, because the people burnt incense before it, and he called it Nebuchitan, which signifieth a lump of braile. He did also celebrate the passe-over with great magnificence, inviting thereunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes. Many there were, even out of those Tribes, that came up to Jerusalem, to this feast: But the generall multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezechia to scorn.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memoriall of their deliverance out of the Egyptian servitude, fell into a new servitude; out of which they never were delivered. For in the fourth of Ezechia his reign, Salmanassar the Son of Tiglath the Son of Belochus, hearing that Hosea King of Israel had practised with so King of Egypt, against him, invaded Israel, besieged Samaria, and in the third year (after the inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Affria and Media: among whom Tobias, and his Son of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Nineve in whose Seats and Places the Affrians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites: as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamab, and Sphernaim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I have formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

These latter Affrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first of whom we find mention made both in Prophane and Sacred books. These therefore serve most aptly to joyn the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets have written otherwise then fabulously) with the Ages following that were better known, and described in course of History. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we find in the Bible the same names by which other Authors have recorded them: but of Phul and Salmanassar, vvith other Affrian, Chaldean Kings, diversity of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speak of Salmanassar, King of Assur, vvho reigned in the time of Ahaz and Ezechia, Kings of Juda, and of Hosea King of Israel, vvhom he carried into captivity: and whereas Ptolemy makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he lived; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmanassar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requireth, that it be shewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that he was the same whom Ptolemy, calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Euchlerus hath well collected sufficient proofe from the exact

calculations of sundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appears, that between Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seven hundred forty and six years: at which distance of time the reign of Salmanassar was. One great proofe hereof is this, which the same Euchlerus alledged out of Erasmus Reinboldus, in the Prænotick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolemy, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moon, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who sent Embassadors to Hezekia King of Juda. So that if we reckon backward to the difference of time between Merodach and Salmanassar, we shall find it the same which is between Mardocempadus and Nabonassar. Likewise Funnius doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samaria, to the destruction of Jerusalem, in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three years: the self-same distance of time is found in Ptolemy, between Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For whereas Ptolemy seems to suffer from this account, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and forty years, than the destruction of Jerusalem, we are to understand that he took Samaria in the eighth year of his reign; so that the seven foregoing years added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the account of the Scriptures fall even with that of Ptolemy, Ptolemies computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twenty and seven years. Now if we add to these one hundred twenty seven, the thirteen ensuing of Nebuchadnezzar years, before the City and Temple were destroyed, we have the sum of one hundred and forty years. In so plain a case more proofes are needless, though many are brought, of which this may serve for all, that Ptolemy placeth the first of Nabopolassar, one hundred twenty and two years after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in account of times I hold more sure than the authority of any History; and therefore I think it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematical observations do so thoroughly concur.

Yet so far as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest unanswered, where by he proved Baladan the Father of Merodach, to have been this Nabonassar, I will not spare to lose a word or two in giving the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next observations of the heavenly Bodies, which Ptolemy recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the reign of Mardocempadus; the second year of whose reign is, according to Ptolemy, concurrent in part with the twenty seven of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which he calculates, being in the second year of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twenty seven years, seventeen dayes, and eleven hours: the account from Nabonassar, beginning at high-noon the first day of the Egyptian Moneth Thot, then answering to the twenty six of February; and this Eclipse being fifty minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; so that the difference of time between the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolemy, according to the Egyptian years. But how doth this prove, that Mardocempadus or Merodach, was the Son of Nabonassar? yea, how doth it prove, that he was his next Successour, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himself did afterwards believe Mardocempadus to have been rather the Nephew than the Son of Baladan, or Nabonassar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Son; he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Country-man Lidat hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Torniellus, who follows Scaliger herein, and Sethus Calvisius, who hath drawn into form of Chronology, that learned work, De Emendatione Temporum, do hold up the same assertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonassar, I have taken the pains to search, as far as my leisure & diligence could reach, after any sentence that might prove the Kindred or Succession of these two: Yet cannot I find in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or adverse to Scaliger; and other good authority, I know none, in this business) any sentence more nearly proving the succession of Merodach to Nabonassar, than the place now last rehearsed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was father to the other, than (that I may use a like example) the as near succession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to have been Son, or Grand-child to Edmund the Confessor. This considered, we may safely go on with our account from Nabonassar, taking him for Salmanassar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driven from our Book, when they find something in it, agreeing with Annius, so far as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon and Affria, in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolemy are assigned to Belofus, Nabonassar, and Mardocempadus, and the rest: no good History naming any others that reigned there in those ages; and all Astro-nomical observations, fitly concurring with the years that are attributed to these, or numbred from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and deliverance of Judæa from Senacherib.

WHEN Salmanassar was dead, and his son Senacherib in possession of the Empire, in the fourteenth year of Ezechias, he demanded of him such Tribute as was agreed on, at such time as Tiglath, the Grandfather of Senacherib, and Father of Salmanassar, invited by Abaz, invaded Rezin King of Damascus, and delivered him from the dangerous War which Israel had undertaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgment when Ezechias denied, Senacherib, having (as it seems) a purpose to invade Egypt, sent one part of his Army to lye before Jerusalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerful Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his peace, as he hoped, with thirty hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold, wherewith he presented Senacherib, now set down before Lachis in Judæa; yet under the colour of better assurance, and to force the King of Judæa to deliver hostages, the Affrian invironed Jerusalem with a gross Army, and having his sword in his hand, thought it the fittest time to write his own conditions.

Ezechias directed his three great Courtiers, to parly with Rabfases over the Wall; and to receive his demands: who used three principal arguments to perswade the people to yield themselves to his Master Senacherib. For though the Chancellor, Steward, and Secretary, sent by Ezechias, desired Rabfases to speak unto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Jewish, yet he with a louder voice directed his speech to the multitude in their own language. And for the first, he made them know, That if they continued obstinate, and adhered to their King, that they would in a short time be informed to eat their own dung, and drink their own urine: Secondly, he altogether disabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Judeans hoped for succour; and compared him to a broken staffe, on which whosoever leaneth, pierceth his own hand: Thirdly, that the gods who should help them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brazen Serpent, which had been preserved ever since Moses time: and withall he bade them remember the gods of other Nations, whom notwithstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and thrown down; and for God himself, in whom they trusted, he perswaded them by no means to rely upon him, for he would deceive them. But finding the people silent (for so the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had understood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerful Army, he himself left the Assyrian forces in charge to others, and fought Senacherib at Libna in Judea, either to inform him of their resolution in Jerusalem, or to confer with him concerning the Army of Turbaca the Arabian. Soon upon this there came letters from Senacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly advised, and partly threatened to submit himself, using the same blasphemous outrage against the all-powerful God, as before. But Ezechias sending those Counsellors to the Prophet Esay, which had lately been sent to Rabfacer, received from him comfort, and assurance, that this heathen Idolater should not prevail; against whom the King also besought aid from Almighty God, repeating the most insolent and blasphemous parts of Senacherib's letter, before the Altar of God in the Temple, confessing this part thereof to be true, That the King of Asshur had destroyed the Nations and their Lands, and had set fire on their gods, for they were no gods, but the works of mans hands, even wood and stone, &c.

Thereupon that moved Senacherib to desire to possess himself in haste of Jerusalem, was, that he might thence have retraiated his Army, which was departed as it seemeth from the siege of Pelufium in Egypt, for fear of Turbaca: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprise (which in these Books of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, I speak but of the affairs of the Jews in effect) yet the ancient Berosus, and out of him Josephus and Saint Hierome, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Senacherib King of Arabia and Assyria: which he might justly do, because Tiglat his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead over Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petraea adjoining: the same Herodotus also maketh Sethon King of Egypt, to be Vulcan's Priest; and reporteth that the reason of Senacherib's return from Pelufium in Egypt, which he also besieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in funder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoiled the rest of their Weapons in that kind, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Turbaca, remembered by Josephus and Berosus, was the more urgent. Saint Hierome upon the seven and thirtieth of Esay, out of the same Berosus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Josephus citeth somewhat otherwise ^{fol. ent. l. 10. c. 1. Her. l. 1. cap. l. 1.}, reports Senacherib's retreat in these words: *Pugnasse autem Senacherib Regem Assyriorum contra Egyptum, & obsidisse Pelusium, jamque extructis aggeribus urbi capiende, venisse Taracham Regem Aethiopum in auxilium, & una nocte juxta Jerusalem, centum octoginta quinque milia exercitus Assyrii pestilentia corripisse, narrat Herodotus: & plenissime Berosus Chaldaice scriptor Historie, quorum fides de propriis libris petenda est; That Senacherib King of the Assyrians fought against the Egyptians, and besieged Pelusium, and that when his Moats were built for the taking of the City, Tarbachas King of the Ethiopians came to help them, and that in one night, near Jerusalem, one hundred eighty five thousand of the Assyrian Army perished by pestilence; of these things (saith Hierome) * *Herodotus reports: and more at large Berosus a writer of Chaldaean Story, whose credit is to be taken from their own Books. Out of Herodotus Esay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Army was in this manner: Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shaking, and a great noise, a whirlwind, and a tempest, and a flame of devouring rustles, fire. But Josephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authority (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted; Senacheribus autem ab Egyptia bello revertens, offendit ibi exercitum quem sub Rabfacis imperio reliquerat peste divinitus immisiss delectum, prima nocte post eamque Urbem oppugnare cepisset, abnuptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis centum octoginta quinque milibus Militum; qua clade territus, & de reliquis copiis sollicitus, maximis itineribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regium quem Ninus dicitur. Ubi paulo post per insidias Seniorum & filius suis, Adramelech, & Sennari, vitam amisit: occisus in ipso Templo quod dicitur Araci, quem precipuo cultu dignabatur; quibus ob patricidium a populo rursus pulsus, & in Armeniam fugientibus, Astarcolidas minor filius in Regnum successit; Senacherib (saith Josephus) returning from god, the Egyptian War, found there his Army, which he had left under the command of Rabfacer, destroyed by a pestilence sent from God, the first night that he had begun to assault assault the Town: one hundred fourscore and five thousand of the Souldiers being consumed with their Chieftains and Colonels. With which destruction being terrified, and withall afraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, he made great marches into his Kingdome, to his Royall Citie, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sons, Adramelech and Sennemur or Sharzer, he lost his life in the Temple dedicated to Araceles, or Nefroth; Whom he especially worshipped. These his Sons being for their paricide chased away by the people, and flying into Armenia, Astarcolidas his younger Son succeeded in the Kingdome. Who in the beginning of his reign sent new troops out of Assyria to Samaria, to fortifie the Colonie therein planted by his Grand-father Salmanassar. What this Nefroth was, it is uncertain: Hierome in his Hebrew traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positively. It is certain, that Venus Urania was worshipped by the Assyrians; and so was Jupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrillus witnesse. Many fancies there are, what cause his Sons had to murder him; but the most likely it is, that he had formerly disinherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Affaraddon. Tobit tells us, that it was fiftie five dayes after Senacherib's returne, ere he was murdered by his Sons, during which time he flew great numbers of the Israelites in Nineveh, till the most just God turned the sword against his own breast.

§. III.

Of Ezechias his sickness and recoverie; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

AFTER this marvellous deliverie, Ezechias sickned, and was told by Isaiab that he must dye: but after he had besought God with tears for his deliverie, Isaiab, as he was going from him, returned again, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recovery after three dayes, and a prolongation of life for fifteen years. But Ezechias somewhat doubtful of this exceeding grace, prayeth for a sign to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiab, the shadow of the Sunne cast it self the contrary way, and went back ten degrees, upon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moved Ezechias to lament (saith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no son, and then in despair that the Messias should come out of the house of David, or at least of his Seed. His diseale seemeth to be the pestilence, by the medicine given him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figs, laid to the Borch or Sore.

This wonder when the Wife-men of Chaldea had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezechias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezechias shewed him all the Treasure he had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiab, who told him; The dayes are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and whatsoever thy Fathers have laid up in store to this day, shall be carried into Babel, nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. It may seeme strange, how Ezechias should have got any treasure worth the shewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the year before. But the spoyle of the same Senacherib his Camp repayed all with advantage, and made Ezechias richer upon the sudden than ever he had been: which unexpected wealth was a strong temptation to boasting. After this time Ezechias had rest, and spending without noise that addition which God had made unto his life, he dyed having reigned nine and twenty years. One only offensive War he made, which was against the Philistines, with good success. As for his other acts (shortly remembered in Ecclesiasticus) he devied to bring vvater to Jerusalem.

In two respects they say that he offended God: the one, that he rejoiced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemy: the other, that he so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to shew them to strangers. But the reason vvith moved Ezechias (speaking humanely) to entertain the Embassadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, vvas because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recovery of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakened the house of Senacherib, his fearfull enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant under Senacherib in Babylon, usurped that State himself, in the last year of that King, and held it by strong hand against his son Affaraddon; who was not only simple, but impaired in strength, by the molestation of his brothers. This advantage Merodach espied, and remembering that their ancestor Paul Belochus had set his own Master Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawful for himself to take the opportunity which this Kings weakness did offer, as it had been for Belochus to make use of the others wickedness, and so, finding himself beloved of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerful, he did put the matter to hazard, and prevailed, the assertion of this history is made by the same arguments ments that were in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here again rehearse. So of this new race, which cut afunder the Line of Ninus, there were only five Kings.

Phul Belochus	} reigned	{ 48 27 10 7 10 } years.
Tiglab Philaffar
Salmanaffar
Senacherib
Affabaddon

But forasmuch as the last year of Salmanaffar was also the first of Senacherib his son, we reckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdom, so have been an hundred and one years, of which, the last five and twenty were spent with Ezekia, under Salmanaffar, Senacherib, and Affabaddon.

§. IV.

The Kings that were in Media during the reign of Ezekia: Of the difference found between sundry Authors in rehearsing the Median Kings. Other contemporaries of Ezekia: Of Candaules, Gyges, and the Kings descended from Hercules.

IN the time of Ezekia, Medidus, and after him Cardiceas, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that variety of names, by which these Kings were called in several Histories, hath caused them to seem more than indeed they were; or whether the sons reigning with the fathers, have caused not only the names of Kings, but the length of Time wherein they governed Media, to exceed the due proportion, or whether the Copies themselves of Ctesias and Annius his Metasthenes, have been faulty, as neither of these two Authors is over-highly commended of trustiness; so it is, that the names, number, and length of reign, are all very diversly reported of these Median Kings, that follow Arbaces: therefore it need not seem strange, that I reckon Medidus and Cardiceas as contemporaries with Ezekia. For to reconcile so great a difference, as is found in those writers that vary from Eusebius, is more than I dare undertake. I will only here set down the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as sundry Authors have delivered it.

Annius his Metasthenes orders them and their reigns thus:

Arbaces	} reigned	{ 28 50 30 50 22 49 22 } years.
Mandanes
Sofarmon
Articarmin
Arbaces
Artues
Astybanus , with his son Apana
Apana alone
Darius with Cyrus
Diodorus Siculus following Ctesias (as perhaps Annius made his Metasthenes follow Diodore , with some little variation, that he might not seem a borrower) placeth them thus;

Arbaces	} reigned	{ 28 50 30 50 22 42 22 40 } years.
Mandanes
Sofarmon
Articas
Arbaces
Artues
Artines
Artabanus
Astybara
Astyages

the continuance of these two he doth mention.

Mercator hath laboured, with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But forasmuch as it seems to me an impossible matter, to attain unto the truth of his forgotten times, by conjectures founded upon Ctesias and Metasthenes, I will lay the burden upon Eusebius, who lived in an age better furnished than ours, with books of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus his Arbaces, I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, reigned in this order.

Sofarmon
Medidus
Cardiceas
Deioceas
Phraortes
Cyaxares
Astyages
Arbaces
Sofarmon

These names, and this course of succession I retain; but adde unto these, Cyaxares, the son of Astyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Herodotus, in setting down the length of a Kings reign, otherwise than Eusebius hath it: of which variations I will render my reasons in due place.

The twenty nine years of Ezekia were concurrent, concurrent, in part, with the rule of the four first that were chosen Governours of Athens for ten years, that is, of Charops, Aphanes, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I hear nothing, save that Rome was built in his first year; of which perhaps himself did not hear. Of the second and third I find only the names. The fourth made himself known by a strange example of justice, or rather of cruelty, that he shewed upon his own Daughter. For he finding that she had offended in unchastity, caused her to be locked up in a Horle, giving to neither of them any food; so the Horle, constrained by hunger devoured the unhappy Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and founder of that City Romulus, did reign both before, and somewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King ruled in the same age.

This Region was first called Aeonia. Lydus the son of Atys reigning in it, gave the name of Lydia, if we believe such authority as we find. This Kingdom was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred upon Argon, who came of Alcaeus the son of Hercules, by Jardana, a bond-woman. The race of these Heracidae continued reigning fifty five years (in which two and twenty Generations passed) the son continually succeeding the father. Candaules the son of Myrillus was the last of his race, who doated so much upon the beauty of his own wife, that he could not be content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges the son of Dafylus to behold her naked body, and placed the unwilling man secretly in her chamber, where he might see her preparing to bedward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queen perceived Gyges at his going forth, and understanding the matter, took it in such high disdain, that she forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with treason. So Gyges being brought again into the same chamber by the Queen, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdom of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight years, beginning in the last of Ezekia one year before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his son Ardys reigned nine and forty years; then Sadyattes twelve; Halysattes, fifty seven, and finally Cresus the son of Halyattes, fourteen years: who lost the Kingdom, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note that as the Lydian Kings whom Cresus his Progenitor disposed, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which governed several Countreys very long; as in Asia, the Myrians, in Greece, the Lacedemonians, Messenians, Rhodian, Corinthians and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians, as likewise from the Corinthians, the Syracians: besides many great and famous, though private families.

But of the Heracidae that reigned in Lydia, I have not troubled myself to take notice of the time of their several reigns: for little is found of them beside the bare names, and the folly of this last King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, between the deliverance of Israel from thence, and the reign of Ezekiah in Juda when Egypt and Juda made a league against the Assyrians.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in History, are like to have belonged only to Vice-roys. An example proving this out of William of Tyre his History of the Holy War.

THE emulation and quarrels arising in these times, between the mighty Kingdoms of Egypt and Assyrians, do require our pains, in collecting the most memorable things in Egypt, and letting down briefly the state of that Countrey, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the mastery. Of Cham the son of Noah, who first planted that Country, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings that reigned there, until the Israelites were thence delivered, more hath been said already than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to fall in such conjectures. That which I have delivered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must here again help me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to have reigned reigned in Egypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Joseph was, and such as were the Soldans in latter ages. Therefore I will not only forbear to seek after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus have reckoned up, from the mouths of Egyptian Priests, delivering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will save the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names only are found; the years of their reigns, and other circumstances proving them to have been Kings indeed, being not recorded.

But that I may not seem before hand to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amiss to give unto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth afford. First therefore, we ought not to believe those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests have reckoned up, to magnifie their Antiquities. For we know, that from Abraham our Saviour Christ was removed only forty two descents; which makes it evident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not have passed away time as many successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, having reigned longer than forty years. It follows that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings in some even proportion, to those which did bear rule in other Countries. As for the rest whose names we find scattered here and there; any man that will take the pains to read the nineteenth book of the Holy Warr, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily persuade himself, that it is not hard to find names enough, of such as might be thought to have reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here insert as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose, for the pleasure and information of such as will not trouble themselves with turning over many Authors.

When Elahadeb the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtle man, made himself Soldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrel to Amalrick King of Jerusalem, and sustained, with little losse, an invasion, which Amalrick made upon Egypt. hereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partie good against him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Egypt. Briefly, Sanar sueth to Noradine, King of Damisco, for ayde, who sends an Armie of his Turks, under the command of Syracon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The victorie was Dargans; but he enjoyed it not: For in few days after, he was slain by treason, whereby Sanar did recover his Dignitie: which to establish, he slew all the kindred and freinds of Dargan, that he could find in the great Citie of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadeb gave little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the administration of the kingdom, whilst he might have the profit of it, and his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would think) do neerly touch the Caliph himselfe. Syracon with his Turks, whom Sanar had gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be intreated there to leave him, and quietly go their way home. They sitze upon the Town of Belleis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arrivall of more companie from Damisco, for the conquest of all Egypt. The Soldan perceives their intent, and finds himself not strong enough to expell them, much lesse to expell the Turkish Armie that was likely to second them: He therefore sends Messengers to King Amalrick of Jerusalem, whom with large promises he gets to bring him ayde, and so drives out the Turks: Of all this trouble the great Caliph hears nothing, or not so much as should make him look to the playing of his own game.

A greater mischief ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadeb particularly in his own Title. Syracon, Captain of the Turks that had been in Egypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was opposite to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heir to Mahomet that false Prophet, the Soveraignty over all that were of the Saracen Law) and tels him the weakness of the Egyptian, with his own abilitie of doing service in those parts; offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the Western parts, under the subjection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Eastern Provinces are up in Arms, and Syracon, with a mighty power, descendeth into Egypt. The noyle of this great expedition so affrighteth King Amalrick, that with all his forces he hasteth into Egypt, well knowing how neerly it concerned him and his kingdom of Jerusalem, to keep the Saracens from joyning all under one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiving the faithfull care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giving them all manner of content, as it behoved him:

him: for by their admirable valour, he finally drove the enemies out of the Countrey. But this victory was not so soon gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concerns our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seems to know nothing. May we not think him to have been King in title only, who meddled so little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose help all was lost) could not well stay so long as his necessities required, makes large offers to King Amalrick, upon condition that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Jerusalem should receive out of Egypt, for this behoveful assistance. But the Christians understanding that the Soldan (how much soever he took upon him) was subject to a higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance with any other than the Caliph himself. Hereupon Hugh Earl of Cesarea, and a Knight of the Templers, are sent unto Elhadeb to ratifie the covenants. Now shall we see the greatness of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadors were conveyed by the Soldan to Cairo, where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great Troops of Souldiers. The first entrance was through dark Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Ethiopians, which with all diligence did reverence to the Soldan as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders lead them into goodly open Courts, of such beauty and riches, that they could not retain the gravity of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beams, all wrought over with embossed Works, curious Pavements, Fishponds of Marble with clear Waters, and many sorts of strange Birds, unknown in those parts of the World, as coming perhaps from the East Indies, which then was undiscovered. The further they went, the greater was their magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuchs conveyed them into other Courts within these, as far excelling the former, as the former did surpass ordinary houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse how the further they entered, the more high state they found, and cause of marvelle; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was never held a vain Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliph's own lodgings, which were yet more stately and better guarded; where entering the Presence, the Soldan having twice prostrated himself, did the third time cast off his Sword that he wore about his neck, and throw himself on the ground before the Curtain, behind which the Caliph sat. Presently the traverse wrought with Gold and Pearls was opened, and the Caliph himself discovered, sitting with great Majesty on a Throne of Gold, having few of his most inward servants and Eunuchs about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his coming, the danger, wherein the Land stood, and the offers that he made unto King Amalrick, desiring the Caliph himself to ratifie them in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would thoroughly perform all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would have him to give his hand upon the bargain; which the Egyptians that stood by thought an impudent request. Yet his greatness condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earl of Cesaria saw that the Caliph gave his hand neither willingly nor bare, he told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth seeks no holes to hide it self; Princes that will hold Covenant, must deal openly, nakedly, and sincerely; Give us therefore your bare hand, if you mean that we shall trust you, for we will make no bargain with your Glove. Much ado there was about this: for it seemed against the Majesty of such a Prince to yield so far. But when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling cheer (though to the great grief of his Servants) he vouchsafed to let the Earl take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the covenants word by word, as the Earl spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors with such rewards as testified his greatness.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himself with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the mean season, using all Royal power; making War and Peace; entertaining and repelling Armies of strangers; yea, making the Land of Egypt tributary.

to a forrain Prince. What greater authority was given to Joseph, when Pharaoh said unto him, Thou shalt be over mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kings throne will I be above thee. Behold I have set thee over all the Land of Egypt?

I do not commend this form of Government; neither can I approve the conjecture of mine Author, where he thinks, that the Egyptians ever since Joseph's time, have felt the burden of that servitude which he brought upon them, when he bought them and their Lands for Pharaoh. Herein I find his judgement good; that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customs practised by the Pharaohs. For we find, that even the Ptolemies (excepting Ptolemaeus Lagi, and his son Philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were given, all of them wholly, to please their own appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdom to Women, Eunuchs, and other Ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Country afforded, were indeed sufficient to invite the Kings thereof unto a voluptuous life, and the awful regard wherein the Egyptians held their Princes, gave them security, whereby they might the better trust their Officers with so ample commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to have shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroys governing Egypt, is set down by Moses, and that a lively example of the same is found in William of Tyre, who lived in the same age, was in few years after Chancellor of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and had full discourse with Hingul Earl of Cesaria touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains, that we be not carried away with a vain opinion, to believe that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians have honoured with that title; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we find by circumstance, likely to have reigned in that Country; after whom it follows that we should make inquiry.

§. II.

Of Acherrres; whether he were Uchoreus that was the eighth from Osymandyas. Of Osymandyas and his Tomb.

IN this business I hold it vain to be too curious. For who can hope to attain to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diadorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius from both of them; and late Writers that have sought to gather the truth out of these and others, find no one with whom they can agree? In this case Amnius would do good service, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him when others do either say nothing, or that which may justly be suspected. I will therefore hold my self contented with the pleasure that he hath done me, in laying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those antiquities removed so far out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Egypt, it shall suffice that Herodotus, Diadorus, and Eusebius have not been silent, and that Reineccius hath taken pains to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or else found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, unto the reign of Thooris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greeks call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set down the same which are found in Eusebius, and give to every one the same length of reign.

Acherrres was the first of these, who succeeded unto Chencres, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seems to Reineccius to be the same whom Diadorus calls Uchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diadorus of a great King named Osymandyas, from whom Uchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timans (as Reineccius conjectures) was the great Osymandyas; or else that this Acherrres was Uchoreus: for the distance between them was more than eight generations. Mercator judgeth Osymandyas to have been the husband of Ancheres, Orus the seconds daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited by Josephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wives into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wives right. As for Uchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to find him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdous, not to signify in this place of Diadore (as that Greek word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging also to Uchoreus, who might have had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vex my braines in the unprofitable use of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diadore hath found of this Osymandyas, was wrought upon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I think the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was portrayed a great Army, with the siege of a Town, the captivity of the people, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this the Egyptians said to denote the conquest of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly piece of work, which Diadore so particularly describes, to have been erected for a common place of buriall to the ancient Kings and Queens of Egypt, and to their Viceroys; whilst yet they were not so ambitious, as every one to have his own particular monument, striving therein to exceed all others. This appears by the many statues therein placed, by the Wars, the judgement seat, the receiving of Tribute, the offering sacrifice to God, the account of revenues, and plenty of all cattell and food: all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the severall Offices of a Governour. On the Tomb of Osymandyas was this inscription. I am Osymandyas King of Kings; if any desire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceed some of my works. Let them that hope to exceed his works, labour to know what he was. But since by those words, or where I lie, it should seem that he lay not there interred, we may lawfully suspect that it was Joseph, whose body was preserved among the Hebrews, to be buried in the land of Canaan; and this empty monument might King Orus, who out lived him, erect in honour of his high deserts, among the royall sepulchres. To which purpose the plenty of Cattell and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name of Osymandyas doth not hinder this conjecture; seeing Joseph had one new name given him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dream, and might, upon further occasions, have another to his increase of honour. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerberg, as the Turkish Bassies are called, that is, Great above the Great.

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, between the times of Joseph & Acherrres (for Acherrres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Joseph was) yet will I hereby seek, neither to fortifie mine own conjecture, as touching Joseph, nor to infer any likelihood of Acherrres his being Uchoreus. For it might well be that Memphis was built by some such King as was Gebour, Lieutenant unto the Caliph Elcain; who having to his Matters else conquered Egypt, and many other Countries, did build, not far from old Memphis, the great Cite of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Cabira; that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistrifles, though he himself were a Desolation slave.

§. III.

Of Cherrres, Armeus, Ramesses, and Amemphis. Of Myris, and the Lake that bears his name.

WHEN Arherres had reigned eight years, Cherrres succeeded and held the kingdome fifteen years: then reigned Armeus five years, and after him Ramesses threecore and eight. Of Armeus and Ramesses is that Historie understood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greeks, under the names of Danaus and Egyptus. For it is said that Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had fifty Daughters, whom upon seeming reconciliation, he gave in marriage to his brothers sistre sons, but commanded every one of them to kill her husband the first night; that only Hiparamestra, one of his Daughters, did save her husband Linceus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloody sisters, when they dyed, were enjoined this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking vessel with water.

The reign of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this ages; but that Armeus was Danaus, and Ramesses, Egyptus, is more than Reineccius believes: he rather takes Armeus to have been Myris, or Meris, who caused the great lake to be made which bears his name. For my own part, as I can easily believe, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of such qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we spake before; so do I not find how in so short a reign, as five years, a work of that labour could be finished, which was required unto the Lake of Attris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his owne Sepulchre and his wives being some part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is uncertain, and of whose reigns we have no assurance, I may truly say, that their great works are not enough to prove them were those of Joseph, who bought all the people of Egypt as bondmen, and all their land for bread; of Gehor, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Country Tributary; were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set down the length of their reigns whom we find to have followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris, is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand six hundred furlongs in compass, and fifty fadoms deep. It served to receive the waters of Nilus, when the overflow, being too great, was harmful to the Country: and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the lake, when the river did not rise high enough. In opening the sluices of this lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fifty talents; but the lake it self defraied that cost; seeing the tribute imposed upon fish taken therein was every day one talent, which Myris gave to his Wife to buy sweet Ointments and other Ornaments for her body. In the midst of it was left an Island, wherein were the Sepulchres of Myris and his Wife, and over each of them a Pyramid, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fifty paces high; having on the tops their statues, sitting in Thrones. I find not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet it is very great. The years of Armenus are by Manethon divided, by inserting one Armes (whom Eusebius omits) that should have reigned one year and odd months of the time: but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After Rameses, his son Amenophis held the Kingdom forty years. Some give him only nineteen years; and Mercator thinks him to have been the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I have already spoken in the first Book.

§. IV.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynasty of the Larthes.

Sethos, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, fifty five years. To him are ascribed the famous acts of that ancient Sesoftris. But the state of the World was not such at these times, that so great an expedition as the old Sesoftris made, could have been either easily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he passed, had it now been performed; as any man will perceive, if he look upon my Chronological Table, and consider who lived with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynasty of the Larthes; which Reimceus conjectures to have had the same signification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria were called Larthes, (the Hetrurians being illud out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to have signified as much as Imperator, or General. The Wars in which these Kings were Generals, I take to have been against the *Ethiopian*s: for sure I am, that they troubled not the Country of Palestina, that lay next unto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they travelled over the desert sands, on the other hand, to seek matter of conquest, in the poor Countries of Africa. But these Generals (if the Larthes were such) were not many. Five only had that title; and the last of these took it, perhaps, as hereditary from the first; in such sort as the Roman Emperours were proud, for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most unsuitable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his successors forbear the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appears by this particular) took name from the Kings; that the Kings also did administer the government themselves, and that therefore I am deceived in ascribing so much unto the Viceroy. But it is to be considered, that what is said of these Larthes, depends only upon conjecture, and that the authority of the Regents, or Viceroy, might be great enough, though some few Kings took the conduct of Armies into their own hands. For so we find in John Leo, that the Soldan of Egypt (after such time as the Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Sovereignty to himself) had under him a Viceroy, (titled Eddagadare, who had authority to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Family was almost as great as the Soldans own. Yee was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord General of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might, as he thought good, spend of the Soldans treasure. So might the office of the Viceroy continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generals upon them, did somewhat abridge the greatness of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it kills not whence they were drawn; whether from their Country, as those of the Thebans and Diopolitans; or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many think, that the seventeenth

§. V.

Dynasty was called of the Shepherds, because Joseph governed in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that reigned; as this was said to be of the Larthes or Generals. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, forasmuch as Vaphres, and Sefac, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let us now return to the business which we left.

Rameses was King after Zethus, or Sethos, threescore and six years. He is mistaken for that second Sesoftris, of whom I have spoken in the first book. I find nothing worth rehearsal of this Rameses, or of Amenophis and Anememes, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned forty, the latter six and twenty years. Wherefore it may very well be, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditary.

Thoris, the last of the Larthes, reigned only seven years; yet is he thought to have been that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, That he took Helen from Paris, and after the sack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I need say no more in refutation of this, than that the time of Thoris his reign lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helen to her restitution.

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others mentioned by Greek Writers in this business, or in other such matters, may seem to be under-Officers: for such only are like to have had their residence about Pharos, and the sea-coast where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is said that he could foretell things to come, and that he could change himself into all shapes: whereby is signified his crafty head, for which he is grown into a Proverb. The Poets feigned him a Sea-God, and keeper of Neptune's Seal-fishes, for belike he was some under-Officer to the Admiral, having charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Remember the son of Proteus is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramissitus, and tells a long tale fit to please children of his covetousness, and how his treasure-house was robbed by a cunning thief, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may believe what he list. How long this King reigned I know not, nor think that either he or his father did reign at all.

Of the Egyptian Kings, whose names are found scattering in sundry Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to Cedrenus. Of Vaphres and Sefac.

Many other names of Egyptian Kings are found scattered here and there; as Tonepheris, of whom Suidas delivers only the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepor, mentioned in Macrobins, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Euenes, noted by occasion of a great Physician that lived under him; Banchyris, recorded by the same Suidas for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gave name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iceland; and that he consulted with the Devil, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had been, or after him should be so mighty as himself. The answer or confession of the Devil was remarkable; which I find Englished in the translation of Pleffis his work Of the truest of Christian Religion. The Greek Verses are somewhat otherwise, and much more imperfect in those Copies that have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

First God, and next The Word, and then The Spirit,
Which Three be One, and joyn in One all Three:
Whose force is endless. Get thee hence frail
Wight,
The man of Life unknown, and wretch thee.

I should have thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas than Cedrenus hath heretofore, as the form of invocation which Thulis used, and that clause of his giving name to the Island: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seems to me, in giving to this King such profound antiquity of reign. Indeed the very name of that book, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breed suspicion of some imposture; but the Frierly stuffe that he alledgeth out of it, is such as would serve to discredit himself, were it not otherwise apparent that he was a man both devout, and of good judgment in matters that fell within his compass. I will here set down the list of old old Egyptian Kings delivered by him, and leave the censure to others.

The first King of Egypt that he sets down, is Mizraim the son of Cham. After him he finds many of a new race, deriving their pedigree thus: Nimrod the son of Chus was also called Orion, and further took upon him the name of the Planet Saturn, had to Wife Semiramis, who was of his own Linage, and by her three sons; Picus, surnamed Jupiter, Belus, and Ninus. Picus chafing his Father out of Assyria into Italy, reigned in his stead thirty years, and then gave up that Kingdom to Juno his sister and wife, and to Belus his son: after which Belus, who reigned only two years, Ninus had the Kingdom, and married his own Mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italy to visit his old Father Saturn; Saturn forthwith reigned the Kingdom unto him. Picus Jupiter reigned in Italy three years and two years, had three score and ten Wives or Concubines, and about as many children: finally dyed, and lies buried in the Isle of Crete. The Principal of Jupiter's sons were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercury: he reigned in Italy, after his Father, five and thirty years, and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went into Egypt, with abundance of Treasure, where, after the death of Misraim, he got the Kingdom, and held it nine and thirty years. After Mercury Vulcan reigned in Egypt, four years and a half. Then Sol, the son of Vulcan, reigned twenty years and a half. There followed in order Sofis, Ofiris, Orus and Thules, of whom we spake before: the length of their several reigns is not set down. After Thules, was the great Sesoftris King twenty years. His successor was Pharaoh, called Narcho, that held the Crown fifty years, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharaoh, to a very long posterity.

These reports of Credennus I hold it enough to set down as I find them: let their credit rest upon the Author.

Others yet we find, that are said to have reigned in Egypt, without any certain note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vain curiosity, in the search made after these already rehearsed, than of negligence, in omitting such as might have been added.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon, and Sesac, the assiter of Rehoboam, lead us again into fair way, but not far. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but we are beholding to Clement Alexandrinus and Eusebius for it. These give us not the length of his reign; but we know that he lived in the times of David and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Army, took Gezar from the Canaanites, and gave it to his daughter, Salomon's wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his son did favour the enemies of Salomon, who kept to many Wives and Concubines, besides this Egyptian Princess. In the life of Rehoboam all hath been written that I find of Sesac, excepting the length of his reign, which must have been fix and twenty years, if he were that Sennacherib with whom Eusebius begins the one and twentieth Dynasty.

Now so far as it would serve to no great purpose, that we knew the length of Sesac his reign, and of theirs that followed him, unless therewithall we knew the beginning of Sesac, upon which the rest have dependance; this course I take. From the fourth year of Jebojakim King of Juda, in which Pharao Neco was slain, I reckon upwards the years of the same Neco, and of his Predecessors, unto the beginning of Sesac: by which account, the first year of Sesac is found concurrent with the twentieth of Salomon's reign, and the twenty six of Sesac with the fifth of Rehoboam, wherein Sesac spoiled the Temple, and dyed, enjoying the fruits of his Sacrilege no longer than Josias the Israhelite, and Cassius the Roman did; who after him spoiled the Temple of Jerusalem.

To fill up the time between Sesac and Neco, I have rather taken those Kings that I find in the Greek Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of those that are delivered by Eusebius, we find no Name nor A^d recorded elsewhere, save only of Bocchoris, who is remembered by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appear to have been a King. Hereunto I may add, that the succession is often interrupted in Eusebius by Aethiopian, which got the Kingdom often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appears by the Prophet Esa, that the Councilors of Pharaoh did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, in so much that they said of Pharaoh, I am the son of the wife, Esa 19. I am the son of the ancient King. But that which overthroweth the reckoning of Eusebius, is the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it please him well to see how the reigns of Josias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed mars all, the reign of Josias being misplaced. This error grows from his omitting to compare the reigns of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Israhel: by which occasion Joram King of Israhel is made to reign three years years after Ahabaz of Juda; Samar is taken by Salmanassar before Hezechia was King; and in a word, all, or most of the Kings have their beginnings placed in some other year of their collaterals than the Scriptures have determined.

§. VI.

Of Chemnis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned between the times of Rehoboam and Ezechia.

Following therefore the Greek Historians, I place Chemnis, or (according to Diodore) Chemmis, first in the rank of those that were Kings after Sesac. He reigned fifty years, and built the greatest of the three Pyramids, which was accounted one of this Worlds Wonders. The Pyramid hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottom upwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemmis being four-square, had a Base of seven acres every way, and was about six acres high. It was of a very hard and durable stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand years, without complaining of any injury that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the reign of Chemmis, unto the age of Augustus Cesar, wherein Diodore lived, are indeed a thousand years; which doth give the better likelihood unto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramids, late Writers do testifie, that they have seen them yet standing.

After Chemnis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his Brother; but doubtfully, and inclining rather to the opinion, that his son Chabres succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabres) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to have been brethren; but the length of their reigns may argue the latter to have been son to the former: for Cheops reigned fifty years; Cephrenes fifty six. These were, as Chemnis had been, builders of Pyramids, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who already had overlaboured themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramids were ordained to be Tombs for those that raised them; but the malice of the Egyptians is said to have cast out their bodies, and to have called their Monuments by the name of an Heardman that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, and entitling a poor fellow to their works, was held to be the casting out of their bodies; otherwise it is hard to conceive how it might be, that they, who had not power to avoid the like slavery laid upon them by the younger brother or son, should have power or leisure to take such revenge upon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale devised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father wanting money, did prostitute her, and that the getting of every man that accompanied her, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramid, that stood in the midst of the other three. Belike he was an insolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery for her sake, longer a while than they thought to have done, in raising a Monument with the superfluity of her Father's provisions.

Mycerinus the son of Cephrenes reigned after his Father six years. He would have built as his fore-goes did, but prevented by death, finished not what he had begun. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatened him with a short life of six years only, because of this his devotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt should have been assisted an hundred and fifty years; which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou live but six years. It is very strange, that the gods should be offended with a King for his piety; or that they should decree to make a Country impious, when the people were desirous to serve them; or that they having so decreed, it should lye in the power of a King to alter destiny, and make the ordinance of the gods to fail in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian gods. The true god was doubtless more offended with the institution of such Idolatry, than with the interruption. And who knows whether Chemnis did not learn somewhat at Jerusalem in the last year of his Father Sesac, that made him perceive, and deliver to those that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian superstition? Most sure it is, that his reign, and the reigns of Cheops and Cephrenes were more long and more happy than that of Mycerinus, who, to de-lude the Oracle, revelled away both dayes and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, he had changed his nights into dayes, and so doubled the time appointed: a service more pleasing to the Devil, than the restitution of Idolatry durst then seem, when it could speed no better. I find in Reineccius fifty years assigned to this King; which I verily believe to have been some error of the print, though I find it not corrected among other such oversights: For I know no Author that that gives him so many years, and Reineccius himself takes notice of the Oracle, that threatened Mycerinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchorus is placed next unto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speaks no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, and excelling his predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by divers Authors, as one that loved justice; and may be taken for that Banchyrus whom Sudas commends in that kind: Eusebius reckons 44. years of his reign.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Ethiopian follows in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certain ages after him. Herodotus quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Afchis; who made a sharp law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paid. This Afchis made a Pyramid of brick, more costly and fair, in his own judgment, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Afchis, Herodotus placeth one Amyris, a blind man, before the Ethiopian. The reigns of these two are perhaps those many ages which the Egyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted between Bocchorus and him that followed them. But all this could make but six years; and so long doth Fundinus, so long doth Reineccius hold, that these two Kings between them both did govern. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it improbable that the reigns of two Kings should have been so soon spent; he may do it by taking some years from Seton or Psammiticus, and adding them to either of these. To add unto these without subtracting from some other, would breed a manifest inconvenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his reign, must have been in the fifth of Rehoboam, as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Jehojakim, and the first of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine own part, I like it better to allow six years only to these two Kings, than to lose the witness of Herodotus, who, concurring here in with the Scriptures, doth speak of Sennacherib's War, at which time Seton was King of Egypt. I will not therefore add years unto these obscure names; for by adding unto these men three years, we shall thrust the beginning of Seton out of place, and make it later than the death of Sennacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him in his Egyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great envy to leave both Afchis and Amyris out of the roll, which were easily done by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet six years further, or more (if the like abridgment shall be required of Psammiticus his reign) into the years of Rehoboam.

Of Sabacus the Ethiopian, who took the Kingdom from Amyris, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fifty years. He was a merciful Prince, not punishing all capital offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour upon malefactors; by whose toil he both got much wealth into his own hands, letting out their service to hire, and performed many works of more use than pomp, to the singular benefit of the Country. Zonaras calls this King Sua; the Scriptures call him So. Hofea, the last King of Israel, made a league with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Egyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserve the Israelite from destruction.

It seems, that the encroaching power of the Affrian grew terrible to Egypt about these times; the victories of Tiglath Phalassar and Salmanassar having eaten so far into Syria, in the reign of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his days (for his reign began in the fourth of Menahem) that Pul himself did make the first entrance into Palestina. This caused So to animate the half-subdued people against their Conquerors; but the help which he and his Successor gave them was so faint, that Sennacherib's Embassador compared the Egyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reed. Such indeed ^{1 King. 18.} had Hofea found it, and such Ezechia might have found it, had he not been supported by the strong staffe of him that ruleth all Nations with a rod of iron. It appeareth by the words of Rabshake, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Egyptian forces, for Chariots and Horse-men; but this power, whatsoever it was, grew needful, within a little while, for the defence of Egypt it self, which So left unto Seton his Succellor, having now fulfilled the fifty years of his reign. Herodotus and Diodorus have both one tale, from the relation of Egyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Country, and willingly retired unto Ethiopia, because it was often signified unto him in his dreams, by the god which was worshipped at Thebes, that his reign should be neither long nor prosperous, unless he flew all the Priests in Egypt; which rather than to do, he resigned his Kingdom. Surely, these Egyptian gods were of a strange quality, that so ill rewarded their servants, and invited Kings to do them wrong. Well might the Egyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chief gods had property property of Dogs, which love their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should have feigned this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I think that it might be some device of the fearful old man, who seeing his Realm in danger of an invasion, sought an honest excuse for his departure out of it, and withdrawing himself into Ethiopia, whither he had been bred in his youth. What if I should say, that the Ethiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, wherof Tirhaca the King (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raised an Army against Sennacherib, when he meant to invade Egypt within two or three years after? but I will not trouble my self with much enquiry. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus was not indeed an Ethiopian (for in his time lived the Prophet Esay, who mentioneth the antiquity of Pharaohs house) but only so surnamed for his education, and because issuing from thence, he got the Kingdom from Amyris, who was his opposite. The quiet and mild form of his government, his holding the Kingdom so long without an Army, and many other circumstances argue no less, but whether finally he betook a private life, or whether he fore-went his life and Kingdom at once, being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and speak of Seton his next Succellor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembered by Herodotus, by a sure token of his having been King.

Of Seton who reigned with Ezechia, and sided with him against Sennacherib.

The first year of Seton's reign falls into the twelfth of Ezechia, which was the fifth of Sennacherib. It was a troublesome age, and full of danger; to the two great Kingdoms of Affria and Egypt, being then engaged in a War, the issue whereof was to determine whether of them should rule or serve. The Affrian had the better men of War; the Egyptian better provision of necessities: the Affrian more Subjects; the Egyptian more Friends: and among the new conquered half Subjects of Affur, many that were Egyptian in heart, though Affrian in outward shew.

Of this last sort were Ezechia and his people; who knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them against his own great Enemy, preferred the friendship of so near and mighty a Neighbour, before the service of a terrible, yet far removed King. But herein was great difference between Ezechia and his Subjects: For the good King fixing his especial confidence in God, held that court of policy, which he thought most likely to turn to the benefit of his Country; the multitude of Judea looking into the fair hopes which this Egyptian league promised, were puffed up with vain conceits, thinking that all was safe, and that now they should not need to fear any more of those injuries which they had suffered by the Affrians, and so became forgetful of God, taking counsel, but not of him. The Prophet Esay complained much of this presumption; giving the people of Juda to understand, that the Egyptians were men, and not God, and their Esay 31. 1. Horses flesh, and not spirit; that God himself should defend Israel upon repentance, and that Affur should fall by the sword; but not of Esay 30. 7. man. As for the Egyptians (said the Prophet) they are vanity, and they shall help in vain: their strength is to sit still. Esay 3. 4.

According to the Prophets words it came to pass. For in the treaty of Confederacy that was held at Loan, all manner of contentment and assurance was given to the Jews by Seton, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports, of Horses and Chariots, that they did not look (as Esay saith) unto the holy One of Israel, nor seek unto the Lord. But he yet is wisest.

After a while came Sennacherib with his Army, and awakened them out of these dreams; for Seton their good Neighbour, as near as he was, did seem far off, being unready, when his help was most needful. It may seem that he purposed rather to make Palestina, than Egypt, the stage whereon this great War should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Affrians and Jews, weakening one another, should yield unto him a fair advantage over both. Yet he fought with money; for he sent Horses and Camels laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Esay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeed; for (besides that it seems by the same place of Esay, that the rich treasures mis-carried, and fell into the enemies hands before any help appeared from Tirhaca) all the strong Cities of Juda were taken by Sennacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Jerusalem it self, which were in fore distress, till the sword of God and not of Man, defeated the Affrian, who did go, for fear, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Ninewe, where he was slain. Esay 31. 9.

Concerning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Egypt, where the men of War, being offended with Seton their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to bear arms in defence of him and their Country; that Setbon being Vulcan's Priest bemoaned himself to his god, who by dream promised to send him helpers; that hereupon Setbon, with such as would follow him, (which were craft-men, shop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Pelsum; and that a great multitude of field-mice entering the Camp of Senacherib by night, did so gnaw the bows, quivers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were fain the next day to fly away in all haste, finding themselves disarmed. In memory hereof (saith Herodotus) the statue of this King is set up in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription, Let him that holds me serve God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priests, wherein how far they swayed from the truth, being desirous to magnify their own King, it may easily be perceived. It seems that this Image of Setbon was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbear to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the nation of the Jews was then well known to the world, whereof every child could have told how much falsehood had been mingled with the truth.

We find this history agreeable to the Scriptures, thus far forth; That Senacherib King of the Assyrians and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peradventure some borderers upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) lived in this age, made War upon Egypt, and was miraculously driven home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did unto his Priest, happy it was (if Setbon were a Priest) that he took his god now in so good a mood: For within three or four years before this, all the Priests in Egypt should have been slain, if the merciful King had not spared their lives, as it were half against the gods will. Therefore this last good turn was not enough to serve as an example, that might stir up the Egyptians to piety, seeing that their devotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I think, that this Image did represent Senacherib himself, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expressing things) the shameful issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Army, by means which came no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed upon this ungodly King, was indeed a very good motive to piety. But the Embleme, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chief Temple in that Town where this Image was erected) might give occasion to such a fable; the Devil helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the Devil, I hold it very likely, that Setbon finding himself in danger, did call upon his gods; that is, upon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had most devotion. But so had other of his predecessors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Jews (even such of them as were most given to Idolatry) would have been ashamed of the confidence which they reposed in the Chariots of Egypt, because they were many, and in the Horfemen, because they were very strong; had it been told them, that Setbon, instead of sending those Horfemen and Chariots, was beseeching Vulcan to send him and them good luck; or else (for these also were Egyptian gods) addressing their prayers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoever it was, doubtless the Prophecy of Esay took effect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor help, nor do them good, but shall be a shame & also a reproach. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisdom, when resting secure upon provision that it will hath made, it will no longer seem to stand in need of God.

Some there are who take Setbon to have been set down by Eusebius under the name of Tarachus the Ethiopian; and therefore the twenty years which are given to Tarachus, they allow to the reign of Setbon. These have well observed that Tarachus the Ethiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Country, or at least an enemy to Senacherib, in the war last spoken of; the Ethiopians (as they are englihed) over which he reigned, being indeed Chushites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they think that this Tarachus or Tirbaka is placed in the room of Setbon, and therefore give to Setbon the twenty years of Tarachus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Ethiopian (as he is called) began his reign over Egypt, by Eusebius his account, after the death of Senacherib and of Ezechias, in the first year of Manasses King of Juda. Therefore he or his years have no reference to Setbon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Setbon reigned; Fundius peremptorily citing no Author, nor alleging reason for it, sets him down thirty three years; many omit him quite; and they that name him are not careful ful to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded unto my self at the first; for measuring the reigns of these Egyptian Kings. The years which passed from the fifth of Reboam, unto the fourth of Jochojakim, I do divide among the Egyptians, that giving to every one the proportion allowed unto him by the Author in whom he is found, the rest is to be conferred upon him whose length of reign is uncertain; that is, upon this Setbon. By this account I find the thirty three years that are set down by Fundius, to agree very nearly, if not precisely, with the time of Setbon's reign; therefore I conform my own reckoning to his, though I could be content to have it one year less. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Pammiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereto the course of this History will shortly bring me, the Egyptian affairs growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Juda, to which it meet that I return.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Manasses, and his Contemporaries.

The wickedness of Manasses. His imprisonment, repentance, and death.

Manasse the Son of Ezechias, brought upon them the Captains of the Host of forgetting the piety of his Father, and the prosperity which followed him, set up, repaired, adorned and furnished all the Altars, Temples and high Places, in which the Devil was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himself esteemed the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, with all the Host of heaven, as gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his sons for a Sacrifice to the Devil Moloch or Melchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhinnon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Devils.

He also gave himself to all kind of Witchcraft and Sorcery, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent blood, as Jerusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was rehed by that aged and reverent Prophet Esay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Jews affirm, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet near unto the Fountain of Silo, to be lawn in sunder with a wodden Saw, in the eightieth year of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous than hath been heard of. The Scriptures indeed are silent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captains of the Host of forgetting the piety of his Father, and the prosperity which followed him, set up, repaired, adorned and furnished all the Altars, Temples and high Places, in which the Devil was by the Heathen worshipped. §. II.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Setbon: The reign of Pammiticus.

That the wickedness of King Manasses was the cause of the evil which fell upon on his Kingdome and person, any Christian must needs believe: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things in those parts of the World such, at that time, as would have invited any Prince (and did perhaps invite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, upon respect born to his own ends, desirous to enlarge his Empire) to make attempt upon Juda. For the Kingdom of Egypt, which was become the pillar whereon the state of Juda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with civil dissention, and after two years ill amended by a division of the government between twelve Princes. After some good agreement between these, eleven of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himself absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meer Anarchia that was in Egypt, with the division of the Kingdom following it, is placed by Diodore who omitteth Setbon; but Herodotus doth set the Aristocracy, or twelve Governours immediately before Psammiticus, who was one of them, and after Setbon.

The occasion of this dissention seems to have bin the uncertainty of title to that Kingdom (for that the crown of Egypt passed by succession of blood, I have often shewed) which ended for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things were not settled until one had obtained the Sovereignty.

These twelve Rulers governed fifteen years in good seeming agreement, which to preserve, they made fruit covenant and alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drink-offering in Vulcan's Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilst this unity lasted, they joynted together in raising a Monument of their Dominion; which was a Labyrinth, built near unto the Lake of Meris; a work so admirable, that (as Herodotus, vvho be- holding it, affirms) no vvords could give it commendation answerable to the stateliness of the vvork itself, I vvill not here set down that imperfect description vvich Herodotus makes of it, but think enough to say that he prefers it far before the Pyramides, one of vvich (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest vvorks in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to have bin the work of Atarus or Menides, a King vvich vvith five generations before Proteus; that is before the Warr of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Deidalus took the pattern of that vvich he made for Minos in Crete. Who this Atarus, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reyneccius takes him to have bin Annenes, vvich reigned immediately before Thorus. But this agrees not with Diodore, for Dadalus & Minos were both dead long before Annenes was King. Belike Reyneccius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Atanethon, Cheremon and others, that are found in Josephus, touching Amenophis and his children to the story of Amasis and Affianes; the Ethiopian mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethon's Amonophis to be Deidorus his Amasis; that Setbon should be Affianes, and that Annenes should be Atarus. If in this case I might intrude a conjecture, the times vvich we now handle are those about vvich Reyneccius hath erred in making search Amasis was Avstis, Affianes was Sabacus; and Atarus was one of these twelve Princes to vvhom Herodotus gives the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Affianes the Ethiopian deplored Amasis; Sabacus the Ethiopian deplored Anstis; Affianes governed vvell, and was mild in punishing offenders; so likewise was Sabacus; Marns the next King after Affianes built this Labyrinth; and the next (saying Setbon, vvhom Diodore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same vvork, according to Herodotus, vvho was more likely to hear the truth, as living nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The variety of names, and the difference of times wherein Diodore believed the Priests, might be a part of the Egyptian vanity, vvich was familiar vvith them in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might add, that the twelve great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembered by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, do help to prove that it was the vvork of these twelve Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemn feast in Vulcan's Temple, vvhen they were to make their drink-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himself, brought forth no more than eleven Cups. Hereupon, Psammiticus, vvho standing last, had not a Cup, took off his brazen Helmet; and therewith supplied the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traytor; yet, vvhen they found that it was done by him vvpon set purpose or ill intent, they forbore to kill him, but being jealous of their estate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the event is held by Diodore as a fable, vvich

I believe to have bin none other: In the rest Herodotus and Diodore agree, saying that Psammiticus hired Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by vvhole aid he vvanguilt his Companions, and made himself sole King.

The years of his reign, according to Herodotus, were fifty four; according to Eusebius, forty four; Mercator, to reconcile these two, gives forty four years to his single reign, and ten to his ruling joyntly vvith the Princes, before spoken of. Indeed, he that was admitted, being a man grown (for he cannot in reason be supposed to have been then a young fellow) into the number of the twelve Governours, must be thought to have lived unto extreme age, if he ruled partly vvith others, partly alone, three score and nine years. I therefore vvield rather to Eusebius; but vvill not adventure to cut five years from the Aristocracy: though peradventure Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelve, but succeeded (either by election, or as next of blood) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten years companion in that government.

Another scruple there is, though not great, vvich troubles this reckoning. The years of the Egyptians, as we find them set down, are more by one, than serve to fill up the time between the fit of Rehoboam and the fourth of Jobshakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one year from Setbon's reign, that was of uncertain length, or else (vvich I had rather do, because Fundius may have followed better authority than I know, or than himself alledged, in giving to Setbon a time so nearly agreeing vvith the truth) we must confound the last year of one reign vvith the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, vvich are set down in Chronological tables, reigned precisely so many years as are ascribed unto them, vvithout any fractions: it is enough to think that the surplusage of one mans times supplyed the defect of another. Wherefore I confound the last year of those fifteen, vvherein the twelve Princes ruled, vvith the first of Psammiticus; vvho surely did not fall out vvith his Companions, fight vvith them, and make himself Lord alone all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt vvho entertained any strait amity vvith the Greeks; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to vvhom he gave large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left vving of his Army, vvich his Mercenaries held the right vving (vvich was the more honourable place) in an expedition that he made in Syria. Upon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forsook their natural Country of Egypt, and went into Ethiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be revoked by kind Messages, nor by the King himself, vvho overtook them on the way; but vvhen he told them of their Country, their Wives and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Country, and that nature had enabled them to get other Wives and Children.

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought up in such sort, as they might not hear any vvord spoken; by vvich means, he hoped to find out vvhat Nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speak that Language vvich men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cryed, Becus, Becus, vvich vvord being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, served greatly to magnify the Phrygian antiquity. Goropius, Beccanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch; in vvich the vvord Becker signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that vvill turn over any part of Goropius his vvorks, may find enough of this kind, to persuade a vvilling man, that Adam and all the Patriarchs used none other tongue than the Low-Dutch, before the confusion of languages at Babel, the name it self of Babel being also Dutch, and given by occasion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble and talk one knew not vvhat.

But I vvill not insist upon all that is vvritten of Psammiticus. The most remarkable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palestina, about vvich he spent nine and twenty years. Never have we heard (saith Herodotus) that any City endured so long a siege as this; yet Psammiticus carried it at the last. This Town of Azotus had been vvon by Tartian a Captain of Sennacherib, and was now, as it seemed, relieved, but in vvain, by the Babylonian, vvich made it hold out so vvell.

§. III.

What reference these Egyptian matters might have to the imprisonment and enlargement of Manasses. In vvhat part of his reign Manasses was taken prisoner.

Where it certainly known, in vvhat year of his reign Manasses was taken prisoner, soner, and how long it was before he obtained liberty, I think we should find these Egyptian troubles to have been no small occasion both of his captivity and enlargement: God so disposing of humane actions, that even they, who intended onely their own business, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the civil Wars of Egypt that followed upon the death of Setbon, or the rearing of the Kingdom, as it were, into twelve pieces, or the War between Psalmitticus and his Collegues, or the expedition of Psalmitticus into Syria, and the siege of Azotus, might minister unto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts, or such necessity of sending an Army into those parts, to defend his own, as would greatly tempt him to make sure work with the King of Juda. The same occasion sufficed also to procure the delivery of Manasse, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Josephus hath it) by subtilty, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, win his Country, but onely wast it. So that the Jews, having learned wit by the ill success of their folly, in redeeming Amazias, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargain upon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters presented more weighty argument of hope and fear, than the little Kingdom of Juda could afford) had no reason to spend his forces in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficulty as a greater, whereby he should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement; when by quitting his present advantage over the Jews, he might make his way the fairer into Egypt.

Now concerning the year of Manasse his reign, wherein he was taken prisoner; or concerning his captivity it self, how long it lasted, the Scriptures are silent, and Josephus gives no information. Yet I find cited by Tornielius three opinions: the one of Bellarmino, who thinks that Manasse was taken in the fifteenth year of his reign; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronology, who affirms, that it was in his twenty seventh year; the third of Rabbi Kimki upon Ezechiel, who saith, that he was forty years an Idolater, and lived fifteen years after his repentance. The first of their conjectures is upheld by Tornielius, who rejects the second, as more improbable, and condemns the third as most false. Yet the reasons alledged by Tornielius in defence of the first, and refutation of the opinion, are such, as may rather prove him to favour the Cardinal as far as he may, (for where need requires, he doth freely dissent from him) than to have used his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before he gave his judgment. Two arguments he brings to maintain the opinion of Bellarmino: the one, that Ammon the son of Manasse, is said by Josephus to have followed the works of his fathers youth; the other, that had Manasse grown old in his sins, it is like that he should have continued, as he did, in his amendment unto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason why the sins of Manasse might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them works of his youth, which appeared when he was twelve years old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimki) until he was but fifteen years from death. Touching the second; howsoever it be a fearful thing, to cast off unto the last those good motions unto repentance, which we know not whether ever God will offer unto us again; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the sins which are not foraken before the age of two and fifty years, shall be punished with final impenitence. But against these two collections of Tornielius, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not unlikely, That Manasse continued longer in his wickedness than Bellarmino hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimki hath affirmed. In the second book of Kings, the evil which Manasse did, is remembered at large, and his repentance utterly omitted; so that his amendment may seem to have taken up no great part of his life: the storie of him being thus concluded in the one and twentieth Chapter: Concerning the rest of the Acts of Manasse, and all that he did, and his sin that he sinned, are they not written in the book of 17. the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda? the other place is in the four and twentieth Chapter of the same Book, where, in rehearsing the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Jehoiakim, the great Grand-child of this Manasse, it is said; Surely by the commandment of the Lord came this upon Juda, that he might put them out of his sight, for the sins of Manasse, according to all that he did, and for the innocent blood that he shed (for he filled Jerusalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who so considers well these places, may find small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasse was no earlier than fifteen years before his death; or most probable, That when he was twenty seven years old, he repented, and

and becoming a new man, lived in the fear of God forty years after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth cannot be discovered. It sufficeth to say, that two years of civil dissensions in Egypt fourteen or fifteen years following, wherein that Kingdom was weakened by partition of the Sovereignty: the war of Psalmitticus against his Associates: and four and twenty years of the nine and twenty, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manasse, did leave no one part of his reign (after the first fifteen years) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose men of war had continual occasions of visiting his Country. All which I will add hereto, is this; that the fifteenth of Manasse was the last year of Setbon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his reign, or (accounting from the death of Ashaddon) the twentieth: The seven and twentieth of Manasse was the tenth of the twelve Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twenty third of Psalmitticus, and the fifth of Nabulassar, the son of Merodach, in Babylon: but which of these was the year of his imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbear to shew mine opinion, lest I should thereby seem to draw all matters over-violently to mine own computation.

This was the first great masterie that the Babylonians had of the kingdom of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmanassar, yet Ezechias never paid it. True it is, that he hoped to stay Senacherib's enterprise against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of silver, and thirty of gold, besides the plate which covered the doores and pillars of the Temple.

But Manasse being preffed with great necessity, could refuse no tolerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impose upon him; among which it seems, that this was one, (which was indeed a point of servitude) that he might not hold peace with the Egyptians, whilst they were enemies to Babylon. This appears not only by his fortifying with men of war all the strong Cities of Juda after his return (which was rather against Psalmitticus, whose party he had forsaken than against the Babylonian, with whom he had thenceforth no more controverſie) but likewise by that opposition, which Josias made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in favour of Nabulassar, which had been against all reason and policie, if it had not been his duty by covenant. Of this I will speak more in convenient place.

§. IV.

Of the first and second Messenian Wars, which were in the reigns of Ezechias and Manasse, Kings of Juda.

Now concerning such actions as were performed abroad in the world, about these times of Manasse, the most remarkable were the Messenian Wars; which happened in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, between the Trojan and Persian Wars, deserve not to be passed over with silence.

The first Messenian War began and ended in the daies of Ezechias; the second in the reign of Manasse: but to avoyd the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I have thought it best to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is needless, than to say, that the posteritie of Hercules, driving the Iſſue of Pelops and the Acheans out of their seats, divided their lands between themselves, and erected the kingdoms of Lacedaemon, Argos, Messene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a vvhile, did afterwards forget the bond of kindred, and fought one anothers ruine with bloody wars; whereof these Messenian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian war are scarce worth remembrance, they were so slight. Ambition was the true cause of it; yvherewith the Lacedaemonians were so transported, that any thing served them as a colour to accomplish their greedy desires. Yet other matter was alledged, namely, that one Polycharis a Messenian had slain many Lacedaemonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to have him yielded in to their hands, could not obtain it. The Messenians on the other side, excused Polycharis, for that he was grown franticke, through injuries received from Euphros, a Lacedaemonian. This Euphros had bargained to give pasture to the Catel of Polycharis, and was therefore to receive part of the increase: but not contented with the gain appointed, he sold the Catel, and slaves that kept them, to Merchants; which done, he came with a fair tale to his friend, saying, that they were stolen. Whilst the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaves that had escaped from the Merchants came in with a true report of all. The Lacedaemonian being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to receive he carried the son of Polycharis home with him, but having him at home, he villanously flew him: Wherefore the Lacedaemonians having refused, after long sute made by the wretched Father, Father, to do him right against this Theife and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrel out of thofe things which he did in that madnefs, whereinto they themfelves had caft him. So faid the Meffenians, and further offered to put the matter to compremife, or ftand unto the judgement of the Amphigyonians, who were as the general Council of Greece, or to any other fair courfe. But the Lacedæmonians, who had a great defire to occupy the fair Country of Meffene, that lay clofe by them, were not content with fuch allegations. They thought it enough to have fome fhew for their doings; which the better to colour, they reckoned up many old injuries, and fo without fending any defiance, secretly took an oath to hold War with Meffene till they had maffered it: which done, they feized upon Amphias, a frontier Town of that Province, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercy, very few efaped.

Hereupon the Meffenians took Arms, and were met by the Enemy. A furious battel was fought between them, which ended not until dark night, with uncertain victory. The Meffenians did ftrongly encamp themfelves; The Lacedæmonians, unable to force their Camp, returned home. This War began in the fecond year of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the firft of the fourteenth Olympiad, having lafted twenty years. The two enemy Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces, the Lacedæmonians wafting the inland parts of Meffene; and the Meffenians, the Sea-coaft of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both fides, were called in to help. The Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, took part with Meffene; the Spartans had, befides many Subjects of their own, aid from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a fecond, third, and fourth battel were fought, with as great obftinacy as the firft; faving that in the fourth battel the Lacedæmonians were enforced to turn their backs; in the other fights, the victory was ftill uncertain, though in one of them the Meffenians loft Euphaes their King, in whole ftead they chofe Ariftothemus.

Many years were fpent ere all this blood was fhed; for peftilent difeafes, and want of money to entertain Souldiers, caufed the war to linger. And for the fame reafons, did the Meffenians forfake all their inland towns, excepting Ithome, vvvhich vvvas a Mountain with a Town upon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to do. But, as fome Authors tell us, the Lacedæmonians vvvere fo obftinate in this War, becaufe of their vow, that having abfented themfelves ten years from Sparta, their wives fent them word, that their City would grow unpeopled, by reafon that no children had been born them in all that time: Whereupon they fent back all their ableft young men, promifcually to accompany the young women, who got fo many of them with child; as they became a great part of their Nation; and were called Parthenians. Diodorus refers the begetting of thefe Parthenians to a former time. But in procefs of this Meffenian War, when the Devil in an Oracle had advifed the Meffenians to facrifice a Virgin of the flock of Ægyptus, that fo they might be victorious againft the Lacedæmonians; the lot falling upon the Daughter of one Lyficles, Epibolus the Prieft, willing to fave her, faid, the was only a foftered child, and not born of the wife of Lyficles: which answer giving delay to the execution of the Maid, Lyficles feeretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Ariftothemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his own Daughter: but a young Nobleman, being in love with the Maid, when otherwife he could not prevail, faid openly that ſhe was no Virgin, but that he had defoured her, & got her with child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped up his innocent Daughters belly to difprove the Lovers ſlander: at the grave of which Daughter of his, afterwards falling, by other ſuperftitions, into difpair of prevailing againft the Lacedæmonians, he flew himſelf, to the great hurt of his Country, which he loved moft dearly. For after his death the Meffenians loft their courage, and finding themfelves diſtreſſed by many warts, eſpecially of viduals, they craved peace, which they obtained with moft rigorous conditions. Half the yearly fruits of their Land they were bound to fend unto Sparta; and they, with their Wives, to make ſolemn lamentations at the death of every Spartan King; they were alfo ſworn to live in true ſubjection to the Lacedæmonians; and part of their Territory was taken from them, which was given to the Aſines, and ſuch as had followed the Spartans in this War.

This peace being made upon ſo uneven terms, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirty years it continued (the Meffenians not finding how to help themſelves) and then brake out into a new and more furious War than the former. The able young men, that vvvere grown up in the room of thoſe Meffenians vvvhom the former War had conſumed, began to conſider their own ſtrength and multitude, thinking themſelves equal to the Lacedæmonians, and therefore ſcorned to ſerve ſuch Maſters as had againſt all right, oppreſſed their Fathers. The chief of theſe was Ariftothemus, a Noble Gentleman of the houſe of Ægyptus; who perceiving the uniform deſires of his Country-men, adventured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Argives and Arcadians, which he found thoroughly answerable to his purpoſe, began open war upon the State of Lacedæmon. This was in the fourth year of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedæmonians haſted to quench the fire before it ſhould grow too hot, with ſuch forces as they could raiſe of their own without troubling their friends, meaning to deal with their enemies, ere any ſuccour were lent them. So a ſtrong battel was fought between them, and a doubtfull; ſave that the Meffenians were pleaſed with the iſſue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords to think them their equals. Particularly; the valour of Ariftothemus appeared ſuch in this fight, that his people would have made him their King: but he, reſuſing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their General. Within unto each part came better provided. The Lacedæmonians brought with them the Corinthians, and ſome other friends to help; the Meffenians had the Argives, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This alſo was a long and bloody fight; but Ariftothemus did fo behave himſelf, that finally he made the Enemies run for their lives. Of ſuch importance was this victory, that the Lacedæmonians began to beſthink themſelves of making ſome good agreement. But one Tyrtaeus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, re-inforced their ſpirits with his Verſes. After this, Ariftothemus took by ſurprize a Town in Laconia, and vanquiſhed in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did ſet upon him in hope to have recovered the booty.

But all thoſe victories of Ariftothemus perriſhed, in the loſs of one battell, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or ſurely the profit, fell upon the Lacedæmonians, through the treaſon of Ariftothemus, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Meffenians expoſed to a cruel butchery. The loſs was ſo great, that together with Andania their principal City, all the Towns of Meffene, ſtanding too far from the Sea, were abandoned for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be ſafe abroad, was conveyed into a place of ſafety. Here the Lacedæmonians found a tedious work, that held them eleven years. For beſides that Era it ſelf was a ſtrong piece, Ariftothemus with three hundred ſtout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the ſiege. He waſted all the fields of Meffene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corn, Wine, Cattel, and all proviſions, neceſſary for his own people, the Slaves and houſhold ſuffice he changed into money, ſuffering the owners to redeem them. To remedy this miſchief, the Lacedæmonians made an Ediſt, that neither Meffene, nor the adjoining parts of their own Country, ſhould be tilled or huſbanded; which bred a great tumult among private men, that were almoſt undone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtaeus appeaſed this uprore with pleaſing Songs. But Ariftothemus grew ſo bold, that he not only ranged over all the fields, but adventured upon the Towns, ſurprized, and ſackt Amycla, and finally cauſed the enemies to encreaſe and ſtrengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing theſe and other ſervices, thrice Ariftothemus was taken priſoner; yet ſtill he eſcaped. One eſcape of his deserves to be remembered, as a thing very ſtrange and marvellous. He had with too much courage adventured to ſet upon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and ſelled to the ground, was taken up ſenſeleſs, and carried away priſoner, with fifty of his Companions. There was a deep natural Cave into which the Spartans uſed to caſt head-long ſuch as were condemned to dye for the greateſt offences. To this puniſhment were Ariftothemus and his companions adjudged. All the reſt of theſe poor men dyed with their falls; Ariftothemus (howſoever it came to paſs) took no harm. Yet was it harm enough to be impriſoned in a deep Dungeon, among dead carcaſſes, where he was like to periſh through hunger and ſtench. But after a while he perceived by ſome ſmall glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Fox that was gnawing upon a dead body. Hereupon he be-thought himſelf, that this beaſt muſt needs know ſome way to enter the place and get out. For which cauſe he made ſhift to lay hold upon it, and catching it by the tail with one hand, ſaved himſelf from biting with the other hand, by thruſting his coat into the mouth of it. So letting it creep whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, until the way was too ſtrait for him; and then dismissed it. The Fox being loose, ran through a hole at which came in a little light; and there did Arifomenes delve so long with his nails, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some fugitives of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Arifomenes was returned home, their tale founded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was received. But when the Corinthian forces that came to help the Lacedæmonians in the siege of Era, were cut in pieces, their Captains slain, and their Camp taken; then was it easily believed, that Arifomenes was alive indeed.

Thus eleven years passed whilest the enemies hovering about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Arifomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slave that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lowdness the wife of a Messenian, and vvas entertained by her, vvhhen her husband vvent forth to vvatich. It happened in a rainy-winter-night, that the husband came home unlooked for, vvhilst the Adulterer vvas within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him by vvhhat good fortune hee vvas returned so soon. He told her, that the storm of foul vveather vvas such, as had made all his fellows leave their Stations, and that himself had done as the rest did; as for Arifomenes, he vvas vvwounded of late in fight, and could not look abroad neither vvas it to be feared, that the enemies vvwould stir in such a dark rainy night as this was. This slave that heard these tidings, rose up secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedæmonian Camp with the news. There he found Emperamus his Master commanding in the Kings absence. To him he uttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Army into the town. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Alarm was presently taken; and the extreame darkness, together with the noise of wind and rain, hindered all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruel fight; one part being incited by meer hope ending a long work, the other enraged by meer desperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompenced partly by the assistance which women and children (to whom the hatred of servitude had taught contempt of death) gave to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrowness of the streets and other passages, which admitted not many to fight at once. But the Messenians were in continual toyl; their Enemies fought in course, refreshing themselves with meat and sleep, and then returning supplied the place of their weary fellows vvvith fresh Companions. Arifomenes therefore, perceiving that his men for vvant of relief vvere no longer able to hold out, (as having been three days and three nights vexed vvvith all miseries, of labour, vvvatchings, fighting, hunger and thirst, besides continual rain and cold) gathered together all the weaker sort, whom he compassed round with armed men, and so attempted to break out through the midst of the Enemies. Emperamus General of the Lacedæmonians was glad of this; and to further their departure, caused his Souldiers to give an open way, leaving a fair passage to these desperate mad-men. So they issued forth, and arrived safe in Arcadia, where they were most lovingly entertained.

Upon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themselves to the rescue: but Arifocrates their fall-hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was already lost. When Arifomenes had placed his followers in safety, he chose out five hundred the lustiest of his men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret haste into Sparta, hoping to find the Town secure, and ill manned, the people being run forth to the spoyl of Messene. In this enterprize, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedæmonians would be glad to recover their own, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to joyn with him; but Arifocrates marred all, by sending speedy advertisement thereof to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Anaxander sent back to Arifocrates was intercepted by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falsehood, which being published in open assembly, the Arcadians stoned him to death, and casting forth his body unburied, erected a monument of his treachery, with a note, That the Perjuror cannot deceive God.

Of Arifomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people, to the charge of his son Gorgus and other sufficient Governours, who should plant them in some new seat abroad, he resolved himself to make abroad in those parts, hoping to find the Lacedæmonians work at home. His daughters he bestowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus, who reigned in the Ile of Rhodes, took to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marry the daughter of the best man in Greece. Finally Arifomenes went with his his daughter to Rhodes, when he purposed to have travelled unto Arady the Son of Gyges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but death prevented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Messenians vvere invited by Anaxilas (vvhose great Grandfather vvas a Messenian, and vvent into Italy after the former war) being Lord of the Rhugians in Italy, to take his part against the *Zanclean*s in Sicily, on the other side of the Strights. They did so; and vvvinning the Town of Zancle, called it Messene, vvhich name it keeps to this day.

This second Messenian war ended in the first year of the twenty eighth Olympiad. Long after vvhich time, the rest of that Nation, vvhoh staying at home served the Lacedæmonians, found means to rebel; but vvere soon vanquished, and being driven to forsake Peloponnesus, they vvent into Acarnania; vvhence likewise, after few ages, they were expelled by the Lacedæmonians, and then followed their ancient Country-men into Italy and Sicily; some of them vvent into Africa, where they chose unto themselves a seat.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and fourcore years, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customs, language, hatred of Sparta, and love of their forsaken Country; with a desire to return unto it. In the third year of the hundred and second Olympiad, the great Epaminondas, having tamed the pride of the Lacedæmonians, revoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epaminondas restore unto them their old possession, and help them in building a fair City; which by the name of the Province, was called Messene, and was held by them ever after, in despite of the Lacedæmonians, of whom they never from thenceforth stood in fear.

§. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manasses reigned. Whether Deioceus the Mede were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Book of Judith. Of the History of Judith.

Arady King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as reigning shortly after the Messenian war, Arady succeeding unto his father Gyges, began his reign of nine and forty years, in the second of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his father, vvhoh encroached upon the Ionians, in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Arady won Priene, and assailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his reign, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their own country by the Scythians, over-ran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grand-child, by whom they were driven out. He had not only broken into Lydia, but won the City of Sardes; though the Castle or Citadel thereof was defended against them and held still for King Arady; whose long reign was unable, by reason of this great storm, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King until the third year of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was six years after the Messenian war ended; the same being the last years of Manasses his reign over Juda.

Deioceus the father of this Phraortes, vvas King of Media, three & fifty of these five and fifty years in which Manasses reigned. This Deioceus was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict form, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessours had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had given to the people so much licence, as caused every one to desire the wholesome severity of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioceus answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he took unto him a Guard; for defence of his person; he seldom gave presence; vvhich also vvhhen he did, it vvas vvvith such austerity, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awful regard, and highly upheld the Majesty which his predecessors had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royal Office, he did uprightly and severely administer justice, keeping secret spies to inform him of all that vvas done in the Kingdom. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching upon others, but studied how to govern well his own. The difference found between this King, and such as were before him, seems to have bred that opinion which Herodotus delivers, that Deioceus was the first who reigned in Media.

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tamir; and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the story of Judith, as also Beir Rhodach, by the same account, should be Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slain, and Nislofernes sent to work wonders upon Thul and Lud, and I know know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last year of Deiotes to have been the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the reign of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In fitting this book of Judith to a certain time, there hath been much labour spent with ill success. The reigns of Cambyses, Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Oebus, have been sought into, but afford no great matter of likelihood and now of late, the times foregoing the destruction of Jerusalem, have been thought upon, and this age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmino, as agreeing best with the story; though others herein cannot (I speak of such as Iain would) agree with him. Whilst Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not re-built, which in the story of Judith is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to have been very favourable to the Jews; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conveniences, aptly fitting this History; and above all, the opinion of a few ancient Writers (without whose judgment the authority of this Book were of no value) having placed this argument in the Persian Monarchy, inclines the matter to the reign of this vain-glorious King. As for Oebus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the business. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this History, there must be a return from captivity lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Joachim High Priest; and a long peace of threescore and ten years, or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Jews. Likewise on the other side, we must find a King that reigned in Nineve, eighteen years at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Jews refused to assist; one that sought generally to be adored as God, and that therefore commanded all temples, of such as were accounted gods, to be destroyed; one whose Vice-roy or Captain General knew not the Jewish Nation, but was fain to learn what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances; the Priesthood of Joachim, with a return from captivity, is found concurring, with either the time of Manasse before the destruction of Jerusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the re-building of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the reign of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before nor after the captivity of the Jews, and desolation of the City. Wherefore the brief decision of this controversy is, That the book of Judith is not Canonical. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that under Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and re-edified the City of Ecbatane, that had formerly been built by Deiotes) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted, he adds, that from the twelfth year to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is, five or six years, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes in his Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to have been so long) might give occasion unto Arphaxad, of rebellion; and that Nabuchodonosor, having vanquished and slain Arphaxad, might then seek to make himself Lord of all, by the Army which he sent forth unto Holofernes. So should the Jews have done their duty, in adhering to Xerxes their Sovereign Lord, and retreating one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affairs of Jury were agreeable to the History of Judith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough be ignorant of the Jews, and as proud as we shall need to think him: But the silence of all Histories, takes away belief from this conjecture; and the supposition itself is very hard, that a Rebell, whose King was abroad, with an Army consisting of seventeen hundred thousand men, should presume so far, upon the strength of twelve hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand Archers on horse back, as to think that he might do what he list, yea that there was none other God than himself. It is indeed easie to find enough that might be said against this device of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessity of holding the book of Judith to be Canonical, I would rather chioose to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some defence upon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all do, the text it self. That Judith lived under none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmino (whose works I have not read, but find him cited by Torniellus) hath proved by many arguments. That he lived not in the Reign of Manasse, Torniellus hath proved very substantially, shewing how the Cardinal is driven, as it were to break through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time, that the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of meer fantasie, it is so plain that it needs no proof at all. Wherefore we may truly say, that they, which have contended about the time of this History, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stony field) have chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni solisque vias, in an age that never was, and in places that were never known.

Surely, to find out the borders of Japheth, which were towards the South, and over against Arabia; or the Countries of Phuland and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I think it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question hath done Chronologers. But I will not buse my self here-with; having already so far digressed, in shewing who lived not with Manasse, that I think it high time to return unto mine own work, and rehearse what others I find, to have had their part, in the long time of his Reign.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

The first year of Manasse was the last that Romulus; after whose death, one year the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabine chosen, a peaceable man, and seeming very religious in his kind. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed only in Wars, to some good civility, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstitions; as perfwading them, that he had familiarity with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies which he delivered unto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these devices of Numa were in his own judgement, no better than meer delusions, that served only as rudiments to bring the savage multitude of thieves and out-laws, gathered into one body by Romulus, to some form of milder discipline, than their boisterous and wild natures were otherwise apt to entertain. This appeared by the Books that were found in his grave, almost six hundred years after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himself was condemned as vain. His grave was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffins or Chests of stone were in it, with an inscription in Greek and Latine letters, which said, that Numa Pompilius, the son of the one Cosius was nothing found; his body being utterly consumed. In the other were his Books, wrapped up in two bundles of wax; of his own constitutions seven, and other seven of Philosophy. They were not only uncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the City desiring to have a sight of these Books, when he perceived wherunto they tended, refused to deliver them back to the owner, and offered to take a solemn oath that they were against the Religion then in use. Hereupon the Senate, without more ado, commanded them to be openly burnt. It seems that Numa did mean to acquit himself unto wiser ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not been so foolish as to believe the Doctrine wherein he instructed his own barbarous times. But the poison wherewith he had infected Rome, when he late in his Throne, had not left working, when he ministred the Antidote out of his grave. Had these Books not come to light until the days of Tully and Cesar, when the mist of ignorance was somewhat better discussed; likely it is that they had not only escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peradventure general) effect. Being as it was, they served as a confusion, without remedy, of idolatry that was inveterate.

Numa reigned three and forty years in continual peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the six and fortieth of Manasse, and reigned two and thirty years, buied, for the most part, in War. He quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to fear, that might grow unto them from the Thyrcanes, caused them to bethink themselves of a course, whereby without effusion of so much blood, as might make them too weak for a common enemy, it might be decided, who should command, and who obey.

There were in each Camp three Brethren, Twins, born at one birth (Dionysius says that they were Cousin Germans) of equal years and strength, who were appointed to fight for their several Countries. The end was, that the Horatii, Companions for the Romans, got the victory, though two of them first lost their lives. The three Curatii that fought for Alba (as Livy tells it) were all alive, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slain; but the third Horatius, pretending fear, did run away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts, could not follow him with equal speed, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning upon them, he slew them, as it had been in single fight, man after man, ere they could joyn together and set upon him at once. Dionysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling very particularly, what wounds were given and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatii was slain, then one of the Curatii, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did cunningly sever the one from the other, as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman History, both in regard of the action it self, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in a wager, against Alba; and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the City of Alba did immediately become subject unto her own Colony, and was shortly after, upon some treacherous dealing of their Governor, utterly razed, the people being removed unto Rome where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother City, had been chief, became ere long dependent upon Rome, though not subject unto it, and divers petty States adjacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the works of sundry ages, and few of them remarkable considered apart by themselves) until such time as the fourth Empire, that is now in the infancy, shall grow to be the main subject of this History.

The seventh year of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manasses. Also the three last Governours for ten years, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I find only names, Leocrates, Ablander, and Erizias. After Erizias yearly Rulers were elected.

These Governours for ten years were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was shortned, and from term of life reduced unto ten years, it being thought likely that they would govern the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to live private men under the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times unto those years of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronological Table, following this work, doth set them. For he not only professeth himself to have taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted alwaies the years of the Greeks, how they did answer unto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this History. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first year of the seventh Olympiad, and affirms, that the same was the first year of Charops government of Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who sets the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

In the reign of Manasses it was, that Midras, whom the Poets feigned to have had Asies ears, held the Kingdom of Phrygia. Many fables were devised of him; especially that he obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he should touch might immediately be changed into Gold: by which means he had like to have been starved (his meat and drink being subject to the same transformation) had not Bacchus delivered him from this miserable faculty, by causing him to swallow himself in the River Pactolus, the stream whereof hath ever since, forsooth, abounded in that precious metall. Finally, it is said he dyed by drinking Bulls blood; being invaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) observed the Moons Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesans, or, (as Ensebins hath it) the Athenians having obtained some power by Sea, founded Macicratis a City on the East of Egypt. Psammiticus herein seems to have assisted them, who used all means of drawing the Greeks into Egypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Milesans nor Athens were now of power sufficient to plant a Colony in Egypt by force.

About this time Archias and his companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians, founded Syracusa in Sicily, a City in after times exceeding famous.

The City of Nicodemia, sometime Asiacus*, whence was enlarged and beautified in this age by Zipartes native of Thrace. Sybilla of Samos, first Asiacus, then a part of Propontis where this City stands.

About these times also was Croton founded upon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracusa. Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient, and so doth Pausanias.

About the same time the Parthenians being of age, and banished Lacedaemon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italy; where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Justine and Pausanias find it built before, and by them them conquered and amplified: and about the same time, Manasse yet living, the City Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Umbrii, now Orbin in Italy. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, over against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenjes, who therefore were upbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long work to rehearse all that is said to have been done in the five and fifty years of Manasses: that which already hath been told is enough; the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, reserving only Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the business that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of Manasses to the destruction of Jerusalem.

Of Ammon and Josias.

AAmmon the son of Manasse, a man no less wicked than his Father before his conversion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatry: for which God hardened the hearts of his own servants against him, who slew him after he had reigned two years. Philo, Eusebins, and Nicephorus give him ten years, following the Septuagint.

Josias succeeded unto Ammon, being but a child of 8. years old, he began to seek after the God of David his Father; and in his twelfth year he purged Juda and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved and molten Images: and they brake down in his sight the Altars of Baalim: He caused all the Images, as well those which were graven, as molten, to be stamp to powder, and strewed on their graves that had erected them; and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sun and Moon, and caused the Chariots and Horses of the Sun to be burnt. Of Josias it was prophesied in the time of Jeroboam the first, when he crested the Golden Calf at Bethel, that a child should be born unto the house of David, Josias by name, and upon thee (saith the Prophet, speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burn incense upon thee: a prophecy very remarkable.

In the eighteenth year of his reign, he rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Priest found the Book of Moses, called Deutronomy, or, of the Law, which he sent to the King: which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the severe commandments therein written, the prosperity promised to those that observe them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to ask counsel of the Prophets Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Book; who answered the messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring evil upon the place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curses that are written in the Book which they have read before the King of Juda, because they have forsaken me, and burnt incense to other gods. Only for the King himself, because he was a lover of God and his Laws, it was promised that this evil should not fall on Juda and Jerusalem in his daies, but that he himself should inherit his grave in peace.

Josias assembled the Elders, caused the Book to be read unto them, made a covenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Jerusalem and Benjamin to do the like, promising thereby to observe the Laws and Commandements in the Book contained.

The execution done by Josias upon the Altar, Idols, Monuments, and bones of the false Prophets at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to have extended unto those Countries; that had been part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Yet I do not think, that any victory of Josias in war got possession of these places; but rather that Ezechias, after the flight and death of Senacherib, when Merodach opposed himself against Asorbaddon, did use the advantage which the faction in the North presented unto him, and laid hold upon so much of the Kingdom of Israel, as he was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding him self

Of Pharo Neco that fought with Josias:
Of Jehoahaz and Jehoikim Kings of Israel.

OF these Wars, and particularly of this Victory, Herodotus hath mention among the Acts of Neco. He tells us of this King, that he went about to make a Channel, whereby Ships might pass out of Nile into the Red Sea. It should have reached above an hundred miles in length, and been wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the midst of the work, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should have the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when half was done. There were consumed in this toylsome business twelve hundred thousand Egyptians; a loss great enough to make the King forsake his enterprize, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. However it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore he built a Fleet, and levied a great Army, wherewith he marched against the King of Babel. In this Expedition, he used the service, as well of his Navy, as of his Land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein are found recorded, save only this victory against Josias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdala, and the Jews Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Judea was a Province of Syria, and Magdala or Magdala is taken to have been the same place (though diversly named) in which this battel was fought. After this, Neco took the City of Cadytis, which was perhaps Carchemish, by Eufrates, and made himself Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Josephus witnesseth.

Particularly we find, that the Phœnicians one of the most powerful Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they surrounded all Asia, setting sail from the Gulf of Arabia, and so passing along all the coast, whereon they both landed, as need required, and sowed Corn for their subsistence in that long voyage, which lasted three years. This was the first Navigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called Of good hope, was discovered; which after was forgotten, until Vasco de Gama the Portingall found it out, following a contrary course to that which the Phœnicians held; for they beginning in the East, ran the way of the Sun, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars and straits of Hercules (as the name was then) own borders, left unto the Jews, a lawful excuse of fear, had they torn to give it any check upon the way. Wherefore I believe that this religious and virtuous Prince Josias, was not stirred up only by politick respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himself bound in Faith and Honour, to do his best in defence of the Babylonian Crown; whereunto his Kingdom was obliged, either by Covenant made at the enlargement of Manasse, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both unto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians, what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemy.

Some think that this Action of Josias was contrary to the advice of Jeremy the Prophet; which I do not find in the Prophecies of Jeremy, nor can find reason to believe. Others hold opinion that he forgot to ask the Council of God: and this is very likely; seeing he might believe that an enterprize grounded upon fidelity and thankfulness due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing unto the Lord. But the wickedness of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such root; as all the care of Josias in reforming the Land, could not pluck up) was questionless far from hearkening how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret Will, wherein it was determined that their good King, whose life stood between them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should give an entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Josias levying all the strength he could make, near unto Magdala, in the half Tribe of Manasse, encountered Neco: and there he received the stroke of death, which lingring about him till he came to Jerusalem, brought him to the Sepulchres of his Ancestors. His loss was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Juda, especially of Jeremy the Prophet, who inserted a sorrowful remembrance thereof in his Book of Lamentations.

ordinary valour of the mercenary Greeks, that were far better Souldiers than Egypt; or if self could afford; and the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more absolute Princes, began to feel it self better, and to shew what it could do. These were great helps, but of shorter endurance than was the war; as in place more convenient shall be noted. At the present it seems, that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did invite the King of Egypt into the Countries bordering upon Eufrates; whither Pharo Neco ascended with a mighty Army.

These two great Monarchs, having their Swords drawn, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Josias advised with himself to which of these he might adhere, having his Territory yet in the midway between both, so as the one could not invade the other, but that they must of necessity tread upon the very face and body of his Country. Now though it was so that Neco himself desired, by his Embassadors, leave to pass along by Judea, protesting that he directed himself against the Assyrians only, yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus or Sous King of Egypt, was utterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian so rooted up and tare in pieces, as it could never after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell upon Juda in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Ezechias, whilst that good King and his people relied upon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasse, were documents of sufficient proof, to shew the ill assurance that was in the help of the Egyptians, who (near neighbours though they were) were always unready, when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seek to have the Jews renew their ancient league with him, but only craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime between him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Army, as did, soon after this, out-face Nabulassar upon his own self unable to deal with Phammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Acotus, though the Town held out nine and twenty years) did give unto Manasse, together with his liberty, as much in Israel as himself could not easily defend. This was a good way to break the amity that the Kings of Juda had so long held with those of Egypt, by casting a bone between them, and withal by this benefit of enlarging their Territories with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friendship of the Jews, which had been lost by injuries done, in seeking to bereave them of their own. When it is said, that Manasse did after his deliverance from imprisonment, put Captains of War in all the strong Cities of Juda; it may be that some such business is intimated, as the taking possession and fortifying of places delivered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he took much pains, in making Jerusalem it self more defensible; yet I should rather believe, that he, having already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himself against the Egyptians, whose side he had forsaken, than that he travelled in making such provisions only for his minds sake. The earnestness of Josias in the King of Babel his quarrel, doth argue, that the composition which Manasse had made with that King or his Ancestor, was upon such friendly terms, as required not only a faithful observation, but a thankfull requital. For no persuasions could suffice to make Josias sit still, and hold himself quiet in good neutrality, when Pharo Neco King of Egypt passed along by him, to war upon the Countries about the River of Eufrates.

The last year of Josias his reign it was, when as Neco the son of Phammiticus, came with a powerful Army towards the border of Judea, determining to pass that way, being the nearest toward Eufrates, either to strengthen the passages of that River about Carchemish, or Cercassium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Dioclesian is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to have done,) or perhaps to invade Syria it self. For it seemeth that the travail of Phammiticus had not been idly consumed about that one Town of Acotus, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters that had formerly belonged unto the Adades Kings of Damasco.

Neither was the industry of Neco less than his Fathers had been, in pursuing the war against Babel. In which war, two things may greatly have availed the Egyptians, and advanced their affairs and hopes: the extra-

then) called now the freights of Gibraltar, having Africk still on the right hand; but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not far from the same freights, leave Africk on the Larboard, and bend their course unto the East. That report of the Phœnicians, which Herodotus durst not believe, how the Sun in this journey was on their right hand, that is, on the North side of them, is a matter of necessary truth; and the observation then made hereof, makes me the better to believe, that such a voyage was indeed performed. But leaving these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let us tell what he did, in matters more importing his estate. The people of Juda, while the Egyptians were busied at Charchemish, had made Jeboabaz their King, in the room of his father Josias. The Prophet Jeremy calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short reign of Shallum King of the ten Tribes: for Shallum of Israel reigned but one month; Jeboabaz no more than three. He was not the eldest son of Josias: Wherefore it may seem that he was set up as the best affected unto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Egyptian, as appears by the sequel. An Idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his business in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affairs of Judea. This Country was now so far from making any resistance, that the King himself came from Riblah in the land of Hamath, where the matter went so ill on his side, that Neco did cast him into bonds, and carry him prisoner into Egypt, giving away his Kingdom to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The City of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place unhappy to the Kings and Princes of Juda, as may be observed in divers examples. Yet here Jebojakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdom; an ill gain, since he could no better use it. But however Jebojakim thrived by the bargain, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdom Tributary, without any stroke stricken; which three months before was too stout to give him peace, when he desired it. Certain it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater task lying upon his hands, than would permit him to wait his forces upon Judea: but now the reputation of his good success at Meziddo, and Charchemish, together with the dissention of the Princes Josias his sons (of whom the eldest is probably thought to have storned at the preferment of his younger brother) gave him power to do even what should please himself. Yet he did forbear to make a conquest of the Land, perhaps upon the same reason, which had made him so earnest in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Jews had suffered much in the Egyptians quarrel, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, unto all extremities, were driven of necessity to forsake that party, and to join with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithful, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaim them; seeing they were such a people as would not upon every occasion shift side, but endure more than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay upon them: so good a Patron did he mean to be unto them. Nevertheless, he laid upon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of silver, and one Talent of gold; that so he might both reap at the present some fruit of his pains taken, and leave unto them some document in the future, of greater punishment than verbal anger, due to them, if they should rebel. So he departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the unfortunate King Jeboabaz, who died in his Captivity.

The reign of Jeboabaz was included in the end of his Fathers last year; otherwise it would hardly be found, that Jebojakim his successor did reign ten whole years; whereas the Scriptures give him eleven, that are current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three months of this short reign, into the first year of the brother, than into the fathers last, the same arguments that shall maintain his opinion, will also prove the matter to be unworthy of dispute; and so I leave it.

Jebojakim in impiety was like his brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, as having received his Crown at the hand of Pharao. The wickedness of these last Kings being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by general words, with reference to all the evil that their Fathers had done, makes it apparent, that the poison where-with Ahas and Manasses had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodness of Josias, but that it still cleaved unto the chief of the people, Ten, unto the Priests Chron. 36. 14. also; and therefore it was not strange, that the Kings had their parts therein. The Royal authority was much abased by the dangers wherein the Country stood, in this troublesome age: the Princes did in a manner what they listed; neither would the Kings forbear to profess, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Jebojakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him insolent and cruel; and as we find by that example of his dealing, with Uria the Prophet: though herein also the Princes do appear to have been instigators. This holy man denounced Gods judgments against the City and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poor man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had unto Jebojakim, that Uria was delivered unto his Embassadour, and sent back to the death; contrary to the custom used, both in those dayes, and since, among all civil Nations. of giving refuge unto strangers, that are not held guilty of such inhuman crimes, as for the general good of mankind should be exempted from all privilege.

It concerned Pharao to give all contentment possible to Jebojakim: for the Affiryan Lyon, that had not stirred in many years, began about these times to roar so loud upon the banks of Euphrates, that his voice was heard unto Nile, threatening to make himself Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawn the house of Mero-dach from opposing the Egyptian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place, before we proceed to commit them together at Carchemish, where shortly after this the glory of Egypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to pass that the Kings of Babel could not give attendance on their business in Syria; which caused them to lose that Province.

Merodach the son of Badadan, who taking the advantage that Sennacherib's misadventure and death, together with the dissention between his children, presented, made himself King of Babylon; was eleven years troubled with a powerful Enemy, Asharaddon the son of Sennacherib, reigning over the Affirians in Nineve; from whom whilest he could not any other way divert his cares, he was fain to omit all business in Syria, and (as hath been formerly shewed) to make over unto Ezeckia some part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Asharaddon did not only set him free, but gave unto him some part of Affria, if not (as is commonly, but less probably thought) the whole Kingdom. How greatly this was to the liking of the Affirians; will not here stand to enquire: his long reign following, and his little intermeddling in matters of Syria, make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or establishing that which he had gotten. Jeophus gives him the honour of having won Nineve itself, which we may believe; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the times soon following, that great City was free, and vanquished Pharaores the Median. Perhaps it yielded upon some capitulation: and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings, being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some think that this was the Affiryan King, whose Captains took Manasses prisoner, but I rather believe those that hold the contrary, for which I have given my reasons in due place. To say truth, I find little cause why Mero-dach should have looked into those parts, as long as the Jews were his friends, and the Egyptians, that maligned the Northern Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was until the time of Panmitticus, about the end of this Kings Reign, or the beginning of his son.

Ben Merodach the son and successor of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is he named by good consent of Authors, and that speak little of his doings. The length of his Reign is gathered by inference to have been one and twenty years; for so much remaineth of the time that passed between the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephews Reigns (which is a known sum) deducting the years of his Father, and of his son Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses Prisoner, and released him. He sped ill in Syria; where Panmitticus, by the virtue of his Mercenary Greeks, did much prevail. This may have been some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his hands some part more of the Kingdom of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alledged before.

Nabulassar that reigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater business in his own Kingdom, than would permit him to look abroad: inasmuch as it may be thought to have been a great negligence or over-sight of Panmitticus and Neco, that they did not occupy some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Pharaores King of the Medes invaded Affria, and besieged Nineve; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remove by the coming of the Syrians, who in these ages did overflow those parts of the world, laying hold upon all that they could master by strong hand. Of these Syrians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is convenient that that I speak in this place; shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes; upon whom they first fell, were baffled in the same times with hopes of conquering Assyria.

Ptraortes, the son of Deioeces, King of the Medes, having by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceived at length a fair possibility of making himself Lord of Nineve.

That City (as Herodotus reports it) having been a Sovereign Lady was not forsaken of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her self she was well enough.

This makes it plain, that howsoever Merodach had gotten possession of this imperial seat, and made it subject as was the rest of the Country, yet it found the means to set it self at liberty: as after this again it did, when it had been regained by Nabulassar his Grand-child.

Sharp war, and the very novelty of sudden violence, use to dismay any State or Country, not inured to the like: but custom of danger hardeneth even those that are un-warlike. Nineve had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had suffered, and resisted, all the fury, wherewith either Domestical tumults between the sons of Sennacherib, or foreign war of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the less wonderful, that Ptraortes did speed so ill in his journey against it. He and the most of his Army perished in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumstances (perhaps they undervalued their forces, and brought a less power than was needful.) It is enough, that herein we may believe Herodotus.

Cyaxares the son of Ptraortes, a braver man of War than his Father, was as much of Asia the less, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys; he fought revenge upon the Assyrians for the death of his father, and besieged Nineve it self, having a purpose to destroy it.
I rather believe Enfchims, that he took the City, and fulfilled his displeasure upon it, than Herodotus, that the Scythian Army came upon him whilst he lay before it. For where equal authorities are contradictory (as Enfchims, though far later than Herodotus, yet having seen other Authors that are now lost, it is to be valued according to his great reading) there do I hold it best, to yield unto the best likelihoods.

To think that the Scythians came upon Cyaxares, whilst he lay before Nineve, were to accuse him of greater improvidence than ought to be suspected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that he was fain to leave the Town, when a War so dangerous fell upon his own Country, doth well agree both with the condition of such business as that Scythian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldean and Assyrian affairs ensuing.

The destruction of this great City is both foretold in the Book of Tobit, and there set down as happening about these times; of which Book whosoever was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the story of those ages, and hath committed no such error in reckoning of times, as should cause us to distrust him in this. As for the Prophecy of Nabum, though it be not limited unto any certain term, yet it appears to have taken effect, in the final destruction of Nineve by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a conquest of Egypt, foregoing this calamity, whereof we will speak in due place. Some that ascribe more authority than the reformed Churches yield, to the book of Tobit, are careful, as in a matter of necessity, to assure, that about these times, Nineve was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victory over it to Ben Merodach: a needless conjecture, if the place of Enfchims be well considered. Yet I hold it probable, that Na-bulassar the son of Ben Merodach did seize upon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about such time as the Country of Assyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian War overwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out ready to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Ninevites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon so much allwaged, that it might be thought a great favour, if Nabulassar, appointing unto them a peculiar King, took him and them in protection: though afterwards to their confusion, this unthankful People and their King rebelled again, as shall be shewed in the Reign of Nabuchodonosor.

§. IV.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twenty years.

||. I.

The time of his expedition.

Now that I have shewed what impediment was given by the Assyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much disabled to perform any action of worth upon the Egyptians in Syria; it is time that I speak of that great Scythian expedition,

pedition, which grievously afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countries adjacent, in such wise, that part of the trouble redounded even to the Egyptians themselves. Of the Scythian people in general, Herodotus makes very large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill known, with many Fables; of this expedition he tells many particulars, but ill agreement with consent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needless to recite them; for they are far enough distant from the business in hand. The computation of times, which by inference out of his relations, may seem very strange, needeth some answer in this place: left otherwise I should either seem to make my self too bold with an Author, in citing him after a manner different from his own tale; or else to be too forgetful of my self, in bringing to act upon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twenty years, he saith, that the Scythians reigned in Asia, before Cyaxa-res delivered the Country from them. Yet he reports a War between Cyaxares and Ha-liattes the Lydian, as foregoing the siege of Nineve; the siege of Nineve being ere the Scythians came. And further he tells, how the Scythians, having vanquished the Medes, did pass into Syria, and were encountered in Palestina by Psammiticus King of Egypt, who by gifts and entreaty procured them to depart from him. These narrations of Herodotus may, every one of them, be true; though not in such order of time, as he hath marshalled them. For Psammiticus was dead before Cyaxares began to reign: and Cyaxares had spent half of his forty years, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia, so that he could not, after those Lydian Wars, reign eight and twenty years together with the Scythians.
It is true, that Enfchims doth also call Psam-miticus the son of Pharax Neco, by the name of Psam-miticus; and this King Psammitis may, by some strained conjecture, be thought to have been he that met with the Scythians: for he lived with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Enfchims himself refers all that business of the Scythian irruption into Palestina to Psam-miticus the Father of Neco, whom he leaves dead before the Reign of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not rely upon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise than to believe him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them down.

It remains, that I collect as well as I can,
those memorials which I find of this expedition scattered in divers places: a work necessary, for that the greatness of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in general History; yet not easie, the consent of those that have written thereof, being nothing near to uniformity.

I have noted before, that in the reign of Ardis King of Lydia, the Cimmerians over-ran that Kingdom, and were not expelled, until Halyattes the Nephew of Ardis got the upper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardis, Sardiatres, and Halyattes, are we to find the eight and twenty years, wherein the Scythians reigned over Asia. Now so far as as Psammiticus the Egyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, even in the height of their prosperity, we must needs allow more than one or two of his last years unto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Haly-attes his Reign in Lydia, being three and twenty years compleat after the death of Psammiticus, leaves the space very scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meet the Egyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must have received ere they could be driven quite away. To increase this difficulty, the victorious Reign of Nabuchod-onosor in Babylon, is of no small moment.
For how may we think it possible, that he should have adventured the strength of the Kingdom against the Egyptians and Jews, had he stood in daily fear of losing his own, to a more mighty Nation, that lay upon his neck? To speak simply as it appears to me, the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes over these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Army, but were the defeitures of some troops that infested their several Kingdoms;
other Princes, and among these Nabulassar having the like success, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardy Northern Lads. Wherefore we may probably annex the eight and twenty years of the Scythians rule, to as many almost the last of Nabulassar's Reign, in compass whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of their oppressors.

||. II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia;
with the cause of their Journey.

Touching the expedition it self, Herodotus tells us, that the Cimmerians being driven out of their Country by the Scythians, invaded and wasted some part of Asia; and that the Scythians, not contented with having won the land of the Cimmerians, did did follow them, I know not why, into far removed quarters of the World, so (as it were by chance) falling upon Media and Egypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; or the Scythians, as mischievous and foolish; or else Herodotus, and some other of his Country-men, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had been beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grievously ravaged. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbri is so well known, and their many Conquests so well testified in Histories of divers Nations, that the malice of the Greeks is insufficient to stain them with the note of Cowards. These were the posterity of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Western World; and whose re-flow did overwhelm no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we do now entreat. He that would more largely inform himself of their original and actions, may peruse Goropius Becanus his Amazonicus, of many things in which Book, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to have spoken of all Goropius his works, that it is easy to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There we find it proved, by such arguments and authorities as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; howsoever distinguished in name, by reason of their divers tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians, whose Country whether he placeth in the West, as near unto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being far from the Sun, and covered with eternal darkness; certain it is that he would have them near neighbours to Hell: for he had the same quarrel to them which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would have made them seem a kind of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to insert into his Works the names of such as lived in his own time, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himself defected. And for this reason it is proved by Eustathius, that the Cimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had wasted his Country. Perhaps that invasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his discourse with Helen, was the very fame, which Eusebius noteth to have happened somewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians, with the Amazons, together invaded Asia.

This is certain, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often break into Greece and Asia; which though it be not in express terms written, that they did with joint-forces, yet seeing they invaded the self-same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journey of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the freights of the Cimmerians, as we find in Diodore, who further telleth us, that Diod. lib. 4. c. 11. the Scythians therein gave them assistance. The same Author, before his entry into those discourses of the Amazons, which himself Diod. lib. 4. c. 11. acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to have been Wives of the Scythians, and no less War-like than their Husbands; alledging the example of that Queen who is said to have slain the great Persian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their Wives along with them to the wars; and how desperate the courage was of those Women; the terrible descent of them into Italy, when Marius the Roman overthrew them, gives proof sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; another place will give me better leisure to speak of them: but seeing that they are noted by divers Historians to have belonged unto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approve Goropius his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were near allies.

Now as concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to have been none other than the sending of a Colony of them forth into Asia, with an Army of Scythians to help them, in purchasing a new seat, and establishing the Plantation.

The Sarmatians also were companions in this journey. For the City of Novograd in Russia (which Country is the same that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way home-wards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was up in Arms; and therefore it is no marvel though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the same people made five hundred years and more after this, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they issued from their parts about the Lake Meotis; they were then likewise assisted (saith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Scythians, their neighbours; they had in their Army above three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandered over many Countries, beating all down before them; and finally, finally, thinking to have settled themselves in Italy, they divided their Company, for the more easy passage thither, and were consumed in three terrible battels by the Roman Consuls. Meer necessity enforced these poor Nations to trouble the World, in following such hard adventures. For their Country being more fruitful of men than of sustenance, and shut up on the North side with intolerable cold, which denied issue that way to their over-swelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge upon the South, and by right or wrong to drive others out of possession, as having title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker, but more civil, people had. Their sturdy bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardships, gave them great advantage over such as were accustomed unto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore most commonly they prevailed very far; their next neighbours giving them free passage, that they might the sooner be rid of them; others giving them, besides passage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great presents; so as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

§. III.

Of the Cimmerians War in Lydia.

The first Company of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand; leaving on the other side, and behind them, the great Mountains of Caucasus. These having passed through the Land of Colchis, that is now called Mongrelia, entered the Country of Pontus, and being arrived in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontory, whereon Synope, a famous Haven Town of the Greeks, was after built. Here it seems that they bestowed the weakest and most unserviceable of their train, together with the heaviest part of their carriages, under some good guard: as drawing near to those Regions, in conquest whereof they were to try the utmost hazard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake even now) dispose of their impediments, leaving them in a place of strength, where Antwerp now stands, when they drew near unto Gaul, upon which they determined to adventure themselves in the purchaser. From Sinope, the way unto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was fair and open to the Cimmerians, without any ladg of Mountains, or any deep Rivers at all to stay their march: for Iris and Haly they had already passed.

What battels were fought between these Invaders and the Lydians, and with what variable success the one or other part wan and lost, I find not written, nor am able to conjecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardes the capital City of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further I observe, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Cyges and Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this invasion, and by Halyattes and Craesus in the times following, all that Ardys did against the Cimmerians, and all, save burning the Milefians Corn fields, that was done in twelve years by Sadyattes his son (who perhaps had his hands so full of this business, that he could turn them to nothing else) is quite omitted: whereby it may seem, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in those Wars, but were glad enough that they did lose all.

Certainly the miseries of War are never so bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forsaking their own seats, labour to root out the established possessors of another Land; making room for themselves, their wives and children. They that fight for the mastery, are pacified with tribute, or with some other services and acknowledgements; which had they been yielded at the first, all had been quiet, and no sword bloudied. But in these migrations, and Plutarch bring so little with them, that they yielded all which the defendants have; their Lands and Cattel, their houses and their goods, even to the cradles of the sucking Infants. The mercileless terms of this controversy, arm both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either win, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or lose their lives without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe have felt examples thereof; and the mighty Empire of Rome was overthrown by such invasions. But our Isle of Britain can best witness the diversity of Conquests; having by the happy victory of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Civil Arts, in exchange of liberty, that was but slenderly instructed therein before; whereas the issue of the Saxon and Danish Wars, was, as were the causes, quite contrary. For these did not seek after the Dominion only, but the entire possession of the Country, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the British Race, and defacing all memorial of the ancient inhabitants through the

the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Chimmerian blood) found such end of their enterprize, as it may seem that the Chimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Asia, did arrive unto. So that by considering the process of the one, we shall the better conceive the fortune of the other. Many battels the Danes won, yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Many the Saxons won upon the Danes, yet not so great, as could drive them quite away, and back from hence, after they had gotten firm footing. But in course of time, the long continuance even of utter enmity, had bred such acquaintance between them, as bowing the natures of both these people, made the one more pliant unto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced in one mild temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons in England, where great slaughter had made large room; others returning home, found their own Country wide enough to receive them, as having disburthened it self of many thousands, that were sent to seek their graves abroad. And such (as I think) was the end of the Chimmerian War in Lydia; whereunto though some victory of Halyattes may have hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seems to have done most, in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should fear to add hereunto my further conjecture, which is, that the matter was so compounded between the Cimmerians and Halyattes, that the River O. Taurus should divide their Territories. For Halyattes was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Eastern side of the River was the Country of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Chimmerians, and other Scythian people; whose wives and daughters these warlike women are supposed to have been.

And hereunto the quarrel ensuing between Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is said) fought in defence of certain Scythians, upon whom the Median sought revenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutual slaughters, should have joyined in a league of mutual defence for their common safety: though otherwise it had been dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdom so far Westward, whatsoever the pretences might be, of taking revenge upon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the War between these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of little weight, and less probability. He tells of Scythians, that being chased out of their Country by faction, came unto Cyaxares, who committed unto them certain Boys, to be instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feat of Archery. Now it fo fell out (saith he) that these Scythians using much to hunt, and commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did nevertheless other-whiles mis of their game, and came home as they went. Hereupon the King being forward and cholericke, bitterly reviled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boys that was under their charge, whom, dressing like Venison, they presented unto him; which done, they fled unto Halyattes. This Herodotus delivers, as the ground of a War that lasted six years between the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding these Fugitives to be delivered into his hand, the other refusing to betray such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians to betake themselves to either of these Kings, unto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly, they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treachery that he shewed in the massacring of their Country-men that were in his Kingdom, of whom it is now meet that we should speak.

§. IV.

The War of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

AS the Cimmerians held their course Westward, along the shores of the Euxine sea, so the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and having the Caspian sea on their left hand, passed between it and Caucasus, through Albania, Colchene, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Servan and Georgia, and so they entred into Media. The Medes encountered them in Arms, but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilest Panmiticus reigned in Egypt. If it were in the first year of Nabulassar's Reign over Babylon (supposing him to have reigned five and thirty; otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then do the eight and twenty years of their Dominion end, one year before the great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giving him good leave to provide securely for the invasion of Syria; which which expedition he began while his Father yet lived, as Josephus out of Berosus relates the History.

Now the Medes, desirous to save themselves as well as they might, from this terrible nation, which when they had no lust to a second trial of the sword, refused not to undergo the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serve to remove these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasanter and better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to be persuaded, that a little more travail would add a great deal more to their content. For they relied so much upon their own valour, that they feared no resistance, and being the bravest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes persuaded them into Egypt, I do not think; Babylon was near enough; whether if he could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his unfriendly Neighbours have cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I do not read. But it is well known that his Dominions lay in the midst between Media and Egypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributary; wherefore we may very well believe, that they watered their horses in his Rivers, and that he also was content to give them provender.

Panmiticus hearing of their progress (like the jealous Husband of a fair Wife) took care that they might not look upon Egypt. lest the sight thereof should more easily detain them there, than any force or persuasion that he could use would send them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow upon them, than on his Army that should keep them back. Egypt was rich, and half the riches had not been ill spent in saving all. Yet Panmiticus took the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had been so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close upon the edge of the Wilderness in Gaza (as I take it) the Southernmost border of Palestina: whence he never advanced to meet with the Scythians, but gave them leave to feel as much of the scalding Sun-beams, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beat upon them. When they were come as far as Ascalon, the next City to Gaza, then did he assaile them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work so much the better, by how much the worse they were plagued with the heat of a Climate so far different from their own. Panmiticus had at his back a vast wilderness, over the scorching sands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary distempers, could ill have endured to pursue him through unknown ways, had they fought with him and prevailed, especially the Kingdom of Egypt being ready to entertain him with relief, and them with new trouble at the end of their weary journey. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, & taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visit their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (besides that hee preserved his own Estate from a dangerous adventure, by hiring this great Army to depart from him) found all his Coast well repayed in the process of his wars in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more than ever troubled themselves with the return of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resolving now to seek no further, began to demand more than the tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grievous exactions, they presumed to live at discretion upon the Country, taking what they listed from the owners; and many times (as it were to save the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This tyrannous Dominion they long used over the higher Asia, that is, over the Country lying between the Caspian and Red Seas; and between India and Asia the less. Happy it was for the poor people, that in so large a space of ground, there was room enough for these new comers otherwise the calamity that fell, as it were by chance, upon those private men, to whose wealth any Scythian did bear a fancy, would have lighted in general upon all at one clap, leaving few alive, and none able to relieve their fellows. Yet it seems that the heaviest burthen lay upon Media; for it was a fruitfull Country, not far from their own home, and lay under a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies there also it was that they had the fatal blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this Herod. extremity was no better than a Rent-gatherer lib. 1. for the Scythians, perceiving that his Land lay unmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force resolved to prove what might be done by stratagem. The managing of the business is thus delivered in brief; That he, and his Medes, seized the better part of the Scythians, made them drunk, and slew them; recovering hereby the possession of all that they had lost.

Such another slaughter was committed upon the Danes in England; but it was revenged by their Countrymen, with greater cruelty than ever they had practised before. That the Scythians which escaped this bloody feast made any stir in Media, I do not find; neither do I read that either in revenge hereof, or upon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by invasion from Scythia in time following.

This is the more strange, for that the Army returning home out of Media, was very strong, & encountered with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no less than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyaxares to free his Country, took good effect, with less blood-shed than hath been supposed. For if he surprised all the chief of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubtless in eight and twenty years had so well settled themselves, that they were desirous of rest, & might be permitted, without any danger, to remain in the Country; many (of whom I shall speak anon) having done what they could in the business, for which they came forth, were willing to return home with what they had gotten; such as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might go joyn with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or seek their fortunes in other Provinces among their own Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are said to have been with Nebuchadnezzar, it may be understood, that a great part of the Scythians, upon hope of gain, or desire to keep what they had already gained, were content to become subject unto Nabulassar; mens love of their wealth being most effectual, in taming the more unquiet love of inordinate liberty. This is certain, that Nebuchadnezzar, as ever after, so in his first beginning of war, did beat the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing had been accustomed to deal with the Babylonians after another fashion: and this new success of that King may be imputed, in regard of human means, to such addition as this of new forces.

Of the Scythian Army returning out of Media, divers authors report a Story, which confirms me in the opinion, that this Company went forth to assist their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new seat, and establishing their plantation. For these had left their wives behind them; a good argument to prove that they meant to come again. The Scythian women, to comfort themselves in their husbands absence, became bed-fellows to their slaves. These got a lusty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers-in-law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their return. If they were only the children of slaves, which compounded an Army (as Herodotus would have it, who tells us, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it must needs be that they were very boys, or else that the Women did very little while continue chaste. Wherefore I rather believe that tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Ancestors returning homewards, which I will set down, as I find it in Master Doctor Fletcher's exact discourse of the Russ Common-wealth. They understood by the way, that their Chrolopy, or Bond-slaves, whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their towns, lands, houses, wives, and all; At which news being somewhat amazed, and yet disclaiming the Villany of their servants, they made the more speed home, and so not far from Novograd met them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon advising what was best to be done, they agreed also to set upon them with no other shew of weapon but with their horse-whips (which as their manner is, every man rideth withal) to put them in remembrance of their servile condition, thereby to terrifie them, & abate their courage. And so marching on, and lashing all together with their whips in their hands, they gave the onset; which seemed so terrible in the ears of their Villains, and strook such a sense into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled altogether like Sheep before the Drivers. In memory of this victory, the Novogradians ever since have stamped their Coin (which they call a Dingoo Novogradskoy, current through all Russia) with the figure of a Horseman shaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may seem, that all the women of that Country have shared the worse ever since, in regard of the universal fault: For such a Pudkey or whip, as terrified those slaves, curiously wrought by her self, is the first present that the Moscowian wife, even in time of wooing, sends to him that shall be her husband, in token of subjection, being well assured to feel it often on her own loins. But this was a Document unto the Scythians, or rather Samaritans (for Novograd stands in the Country that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselves any more so long from their wives; which after this, I find not that they did.

Thus

Thus much I thought good to set down of the Scythian expeditions; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, & terrible to many Countries; but for that it appears to have been a great cause of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Judaea, which continues yet a while the center of our discourse.

§. V.

Of Princes living in divers Countries, in these ages.

HAVING thus far digressed from the matters of Juda, to avoid all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings, and men of mark, as were between the death of Manasses, and the ruin of Jerusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I have spoken as much as I thought needful. In Rome, Tullius Hostilius held the Kingdom until the one and twentieth year of Josias; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding, reigned four and twenty years. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, prevailed so far by his graciousness among the people, that he got the Kingdom to himself, dis appointing the sons of Ancus, over whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth year of Zedekia, and reigned eight and thirty years. In this time it was, namely, in the second year of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedemonians bethinking them how to be avenged of the Arcadians, who gave succour to the Messenians against them in the former war, entered their Territory, took the City of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soon after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacidae, made himself Lord of Corinth about these times, and governed it in peace thirty years, leaving for successeur his son Periander, one of the seven Sages, but a cruel Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his own wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women stark naked, burning their apparel, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceive, that the wisdom of the Greeks was not excellent in those days, when such a one as this could be admired as excelling all the Country.

In these times also were Zaleucus and Draco, famous lawgivers, the one among the Locrians in Italy, the other in the City of Athens. The Laws of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to have written them with blood: for he rewarded every small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soon abrogated, and power given to Solon by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Laws of Zaleucus were very mild. He forbade any Gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unless it were when she was drunk; or to go forth of the Town by night, unless it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dress her self up in immodest bravery, unless it were to inveigle a lover. By which pleasant ordinances he effected his desire: for none would seem, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of justice, that when his own son had committed adultery, and was therefore to lose both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gave one eye of his own to save the young man (who also lost one) from utter blindness.

I shall not therefore need so far to wander, as hitherto I often have done, in pursuing of actions collateral to the History; for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will soon fall under the Persians; ere long, encounter with the Greeks; the Greeks, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing Estate, it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befall them in their Minority. But in the long space of more than thirteen hundred years, which passed between the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Jerusalem, we find little matter, wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very nearest borderers. Yet read we of many Kingdoms, that in these many ages were erected and thrown down; as likewise many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any near distance; all which must have been quite omitted, or else reserved unto a very unreasonable rehearsal, had they not been disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conveniency, may pardon the necessity.

§. VI.

The oppression of Judaea, and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans.

NOW to return to the Jewish Story, from whence we have so far digressed. In the third year of Jehoiakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet living, entred Judea with a great Army, who besieging and forcing Jerusalem, made Jehojakim his vassal in despite of Necho, that had established him King, and took with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a child, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also he took a part of the Church treasures; but stayed not to search them thoroughly; for Necho halted to the succour of Jehojakim, hoping to find Nabuchodonosor in Judea: wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himself and his Army, it being a Country of an evil affection towards him, as also far off from any succour or sure place of retreat. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian horse-men in his Army, it was the more wisely done of him, to fall back, out of the rough, mountainous, and over-hot Country, into places that were more even and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father happening at the same time, gave him just occasion to return home, and take possession of his own Kingdom, before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more unto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him so far, and to bid him battle, until the new year came in; which was the fourth of Jehojakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Necho. In this year the Babylonian lying upon the Bank Euphrates (his own territory bounding it on the North-side) attended the arrival of Necho. There, after a resolved contention for victory, Necho was slain, and his Army remaining forced to save it self; which full ill it did, by a violent retreat. This victory Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatsoever the Egyptians held out of their proper Territory towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Jehojakim held himself quiet, as being friend in heart unto the Egyptians, yet having made his peace with the Chaldean the year before; who contented with such profit as he could then readily make, had forbore to lay any Tribute upon Juda. But this cool reservedness of Jehojakim, was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Psammis, who succeeded unto Necho, began to think upon restoring Jehoaabaz, taken prisoner by his Father, and setting him up as a Domestical Enemy, against his ungrateful brother. Against all such accidents, the Judean had prepared the usual remedy practised by his forefathers: for he had made his own son Jechonia King with him long before, in the second year of his own Reign, when the Boy was but eight years old. As for this rumour of Jehoaabaz his return, the Prophet Jeremy foretold, that it should prove idle, saying: He shall not return thither, but he shall die in the place whither they had led him captive, and shall see this Land no more. The Egyptians indeed, having spent all their Mercenary forces, and received that heavy blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharp steel, as of fair gold, which without other help, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Psammis Apres, who reigning after Psammis, did once adventure to show his face in Syria; but after a big look, he was glad to retire, without adventuring the hazard of a battle. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with brave words, telling such frivolous tales, as men that mean to do nothing, use, of their glorious acts fore-past, against Josias and Jehoaabaz. In this case it was easier for Jehojakim to give them satisfaction, by letting them understand the sincerity of his affection towards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to work more roundly. He sent a peremptory message to Jehojakim, willing him not to stand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himself a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto such fearful threats, as made the poor Judean lay aside all thoughts of Pharaoh, and yield to do, as the more mighty would have him. So he continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonosor three years. At this time Jeremy the Prophet cried out against the Jews, putting them in mind that he had now three and twenty years exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stopp'd their ears against him, and the rest of the Prophets, he now pronounced their captivity at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seventy years. The same calamity he threatened to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, and the rest; foretelling that they should all drink out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his fury, whom they had forsaken; and after the seventy years expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the same Cup, and be utterly subverted by the Medes, and the Judeans permitted to return again into their own Fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Jeremy seems to have been in the fourth year of this Jehojakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrought all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he sent to read them unto the People, and afterwards to the Princes, who offered them to the King; but fearing the Kings fury, they had first let Jeremy at liberty, and advised him and Baruch to hide themselves.

Jehojakim, after he heard a part of it, and perceived the ill news therein delivered, made no more ado, but did cut the Book in peices and cast it into the fire. All which Jeremy caused to be new written with this addition; that the dead body of Jehojakim should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost, and there should be none of his seed to sit on the Throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Jehojakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptians; the mighty City of Tyre opposed it self against the Chaldean forces, and upon just confidence of her own strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her: Now forasmuch as the term of seventy years was prescribed unto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Jerusalem, and other towns and countries; it is apparent, that they which referre the expugnation of this City unto the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, have sure authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewise it follows of necessity, that the siege thereof began in the seventh of his Reign, as having lasted thirteen years.

Here I will take leave to intrude a brief note, concerning the several beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath risen much disputation. The third year of Jehojakim, was the last of Nabonassar, who being delivered from other cares, took notice of such as had revolted from him unto Pharaoh Necho, and sent this Noble Prince his son, with an Army into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same year. The year next following, being the fourth of Jehojakim, was the first of Nebuchadnezzar; which Jeremy affirmeth in expresse words; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth year he conquered Egypt; & then began to reign as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this year it was, wherein he saw that vision, of the Image consisting of sundry Metals; which did prefigure the succession of great Kingdoms, that should rule the Earth, before the coming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputes; but return unto the siege of Tyre, which began in the seventh of his Reign:

The City of Tyre covered all the ground of an Island, that was divided from the main, by a deep and broad channell of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to use them, excelled all other Nations; and every wind, from one part or other, brought needfull provisions into the City. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof nevertheless the judgments of God (denounced against it by Elsay, Jeremy, Ezechiel) had threatened the destruction; & the obstinate resolution of Nabuchodonosor had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, undertook a vast peice of work, even to fill up the Sea that parted the Island from the Continent. The City of old Tyru, that stood opposite to the new, upon the firm Land, and the mountain of Lybanus neer adjoining that was laden with Cedars, and abundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteen years were spent in this laborious, and almost hopelesse business. Which needeth not seem strange: for Alexander working upon that foundation which was remaining of Nabuchodonosor's Piers, and being withall assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seven months ere he could make way into the City. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that where-with Alexander laboured to cover a self, with much more violence could it overturn, and as it were consume, the work of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottom of the deep; striving as it were, to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant; whereas the Macedonian did only stop the throat of it. Every man knows, God could have furthered the accomplishment of his own threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to use, either Miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earthquakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calm, and adding the favorable concurrence of all second helps. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to use the hand of man; even the hand of man striving, as may seem against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldeans, Every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not give over till he was master of the Town.

When he was entred upon this desperate service, whether it were so, that some losses received, some mutiny in his Army, or (which is most likely, and so Josaphus reports it) some glorious rumour of the Egyptians, gave courage to his evil willers, Jehojakim renounced his subjection, and began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gave him no leisure to do much hurt; but with part of his Army marched directly into Judea, where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Egyptians having left him, as it were, in a dream) that he entered Jerusalem, and layed hands on Jehojakim, whom he first bound and determined to send to Babylon; but changing counsell, he caused him to be slain in the place, and gave him the sepulchre of an Assie, to be devoured by beasts and ravenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leaving in his place Jehojakim or Jechonias his son; whom, after three moneths and ten dayes Nabuchodonosor removed, and sent prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardocheus and Josedech, the high Priest. The mother of Jechonias, together with his servants Eunuchs, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the land, were also then carried away Captives. This Jechonias, following the counsell of Jeremy the Prophet, made no resistance; but submitted himself to the Kings will: wherein he both pleased God, and did that which was best for himself; though at the present it might seem otherwise, to such as considered the evil that befell him, rather than the greater evil that he thereby avoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded, which was good. But it seems that he was partaker, at least of his Fathers faults, if not an instigator, which was the cause, that his submitting himself to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate: for so we read in general words, that he did evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Mathania his Uncle in the Kingdom of Juda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the justice of God. For like as Neco King of Egypt had formerly displaced Jehoaiaz, after his Father Josias was slain, and set up Jehojakim, the son of another mother, so Nabuchodonosor slew Jehojakim, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his son Jechonias Prisoner to Babel, gave the Kingdom to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Jehoaiaz, whom Neco took with him into Egypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gave him, and called the living God to witness in the same, that he would remain assured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the first year of Zedechias, Jeremy saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Judeans that were carried away captive, the other those that stayed and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Jeremy wrote in a book all the evil that should fall upon Babylon, which book or scroll he gave to Seraiab, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor; willing him first to read it to the Captive Jewes; and then to bind it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her. This journey of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to have been a way of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further think, that he had some sute there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his return all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seems) to those unquiet courses, from which Jeremy exhorted both him and them. The prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes, one of which he wore about his own neck, others he sent unto the five Kings, of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Sidon, by those Messengers which came to visit Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Juda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enjoy their own countries; if not, they should assuredly perish by the sword, by fire and pestilence.

He also foretold them, that those Vessels which as yet remained in Jerusalem, should also travell after the rest, and at length they should be restored again.

The same year Ananias, the false Prophet, took off the wooden Chain which Jeremy wore in sign of the Captivity of the Jews, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two years God would break the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he laid on all Nations; restore Jechonias and all the Jewes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and give an end to all these troubles. But Jeremy, instead of his wooden yoke, wore a Coller of yron: and in sign that Ananias had given a deceitfull and false hope to the people, he foretold the death of this cold Prophet, which seized upon him in the second Moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wavered long enough between Faith and Passion, in the eighth year of his reign, he practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrrians, and others that were promised great aydes of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had had knowledge, he marched with his Army in the dead of Winter, toward Jerusalem, and besieged it. Jeremy perfwaded Zedechias to render the City and himself: but being confident of the help from Egypt, and being perfwaded by his Counsellors and false Prophets, that it was impossible that the kingdom of Juda should be extirpate, untill the coming of Silo (according to the Prophecy of Jacob) he despised the words of Jeremy, and imprisoned him. For Jeremy had told the King that the City should be taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but be taken prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his natural death.

Jerusalem being the following year surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Armie; the King of Egypt, Pharao Hophra, according to Jeremy, (Herodotus calleth him Apries) entered the border of Juda with his Army to succour Zedechias, of whose revolt he had been the principal Author. But Jeremy gave the Jews faithfull counsell, willing them not to have any trust in the succours of Egypt: for he assured them that they should return again, and in no sort relieve them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans removed from Jerusalem to encounter the Egyptians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprize, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough, leaving the poor people of Jerusalem to their destined miseries.

In the mean while the Jewes, who in their first extremity had manumitted their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods law required at the year of Jubile) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now upon the breaking up of the Chaldean Army, repent them of their Charity: and thinking all had been at an end, held them perforce to their former slavery. But the Chaldees being returned to the siege, the Prophet Jeremy, when the state of Jerusalem began now to grow to extremity, counselled Zedechias to render himself unto them; assuring him of his own life, and the safety of the City, if he would so do. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelity and perjury, had provided for him.

Three and twenty Moneths (as some do reckon it) or, according to Josephus, eighteen, the Babylonian Army laid before Jerusalem, and held it exceeding straightly besieged. For they built Forts against it round about, or

(as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam turrem ligneam per circuitum: They surrounded the City with wooden Towers, so as the besieged could neither fallly out, nor receive into the City any supply of men or victuals. Josephus reports, that they overtopped the Walls with high Towers raised upon Mounts; from which they did beat upon the Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forsake their Stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counter-buildings, like unto these, yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Rivers to obey him, found means to overthrow all the Citizens endeavours; and to beat down as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his own works being guarded by the Walls of Jerusalem interposed; and theirs within, laid open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both Famine and Pestilence (which commonly accompany men straightly besieged) grew on fast upon them, whereby, when the number, strength, and courage of the Jews failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did seat themselves, as Lords of the Town, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this uncomfortable sight, and finding no remedy of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hopes at once; and shifted himself, together with his Wives, Children, Princes, and principal servants, out of the City, by a way under ground; leaving his amazed and guideless people to the merciless swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremy the Prophet perfwaded him to render himself, despised both the counsell of God, and the force of Nabuchodonosor, used now that remedy, which Wolpius truly termeth, Triste, turpe, et infelix: Woful, shameful, and unfortunate.

By this secret subterranean vault, Zedechias making his stealthy recovery (by the help of the dark night) the Plains or Deserts of Jericho: but by reason of the train that followed him and his (every one leading with him those whom they held most dear unto them) he was easily traced and pursued. How great soever the company was that attended on him, yet, as Josephus reports it, they, on whose fidelity he most repoted himself, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselves into the Deserts, as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children and Princes, he was conveyed veyed to Rebla or Reblath, a City (as some think) of Nephtalim, where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent between Jerusalem and Tyre, with both which at once he had to do.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had laid before Zedechias the many graces and benefits conferred upon him, together with the notable falsehood and perjury, wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes and Friends to be slain before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last that ever he should behold in the world, he caufed his eyes to be torn out of his head, and so carried him in a slavish manner to Babel, where he consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetual imprisonment. Herein this most marvellous Prophecy of Ezechiel was performed; Adducam eum in Babyloniam, & ipsam non videbit: I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it.

Thus in the eleventh and last year of Zedechias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldeans entered the City by force, where sparing no sex nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

In the next year following, Nabuzaradan General of the Army, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Jerusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seventh to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood four hundred thirty and one years.

After this, upon a second search, Nabuzaradan (not yet fatiated with blood) commanded seventy and two others to be slaughtered, which had hidden themselves from the first fury, to wit, the chief, and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of War, five of his House-hold servants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Judea; and leaving the poorest labouring souls, with some that followed the party of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground: over whom he left Governor, Godoliah the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Josias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his justice and equity, by Josephus highly commended. This man, a Jew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the War: and by Jeremies desire to live with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same advice which the Prophet gave unto Zedechias; which was, to submit himself altogether to the Babylonians; who being ordained by God to exercise his justice, was therefore resolute. The Prophet Jeremy being left to his own choice, either to live in Chaldea, or elsewhere, he made election of Godoliah, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Jeremy, but gave comfort to all the other Jews that were left under his charge, promising them favour and liberty, so long as they remained obedient subjects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom he was established Provincial Governor of his own Nation.

But ere that year was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Jerusalem, had kept himself out of the storm, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other chosen men, while Godoliah feasted them in Maspha or Mispha, the City of his residence, traitorously slew him, together with divers Chaldeans and Jews that accompanied him. This done, he made an escape, and in his way encountering with eighty persons, repairing towards Godoliah with presents, he slew the most of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discover unto him some Treasures hidden in the fields during the war. He also took with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonosor. This practice and intent of Ismael had been formerly discovered unto Godoliah by Johanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Jews; but Godoliah was incredulous.

Judea being now left without a Governor (for Ismael durst not take it upon him, but retired himself, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Jews, fearing the revenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to fly away into Egypt, and besought Jeremy to ask counsel of God for them: who readily made them answer, that if they remained in Judea, God would provide for them, and shew them mercy; but if they sought to save themselves in Egypt, that they should then undoubtedly perish. Notwithstanding this advice, the Jews held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and contraining Jeremy and Baruch to accompany them, they travelled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharao, near unto Taphnes: where when Jeremy often reprehended them for their Idolatry, foretelling both the destruction of themselves, and the Egyptians, also, he was by these his own hard-hearted and ungrateful Countrymen, stoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly revered him, buried near the Sepulchre of their own Kings.

Of the Connexion of Sacred and Profane History.

THE course of time, which in prophane Histories might rather be discerned through the greatest part of its way hitherto passed, in some out-worn foot-steps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Eastern Countries by the account from Nabonassar, left surer marks, and more applicable to actions concurrent, than were the War of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruins of Jerusalem, to discover the connexion of antiquity fore-spent, with the story of succeeding Ages. Manifest it is, that the original and progress of Israel was either none, or an unregarded Nations could ill be fought in those that were ignorant of the first Creation: as likewise that the affairs of Kingdoms and Empires afterwards grown up, are not to be found among those that have now no state nor policy remaining of their own. Having therefore pursued the history of the World unto that age, from whence the memory of succeeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse derived unto us. I hold it now convenient, briefly to shew, by what means and circumstances the History of the Hebrews, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conjoined with the following times, wherein that Image of sundry metals discovered by God unto Nebuchadnezzar, did reign over the earth, when Israel was either none, or an unregarded Nations could ill be fought in those that were

Herein I do not hold it needfull to infill upon those authorities which give, as it were by hear-say, a certain year of some old Affrian King unto some action or event, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his Issue that occupied the Kingdom afterwards, depending upon the uncertain relations of such as were neither constant in assigning the years of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to rely upon. Let it therefore suffice that the consent and harmony which some have found in the years of those over-worn Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwise might have been forgotten. Now concerning the latter Kings of that Nation, howsoever it be true, that we find the names of all, or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could we only learn in what Age each of them lived, but not in what year his reign began or ended, were it not that the reign of Nebuchadnessar is more precisely applied to the times of Jehojakim and Zedekias. Hence have we the first light whereby to discover the means of connecting the sacred and prophane Histories. For under Nebuchadnessar was the beginning of the Captivity of Judah, which ended when seventy years were expired; and these seventy years took end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well known, affords us means of looking back into the Ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first year of Cyrus his reign in Persia, by general consent, is joyned with the first year of the 55 Olympiads; where, that he reigned three and twenty years before his Monarchy, and seven years afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controversy. Giving therefore four hundred and eight years unto the distance between the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiad by Iphitus; we may easily arrive unto those antiquities of Greece, which were not merely fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilst in sundry parts of the World, St. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting down their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved faith and industry.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned unto Alexander, and from him to the battell of Actium, it were (peradventure) in this place impertinent to set down. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian Captivity, are marks whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first unto the latest years of the World through any story, with least interruption; it is very expedient that we take some pains to inform our selves truly of the Seventy years during which it continued, even from Nebuchadnessar unto Cyrus.

§. I.

A brief rehearsal of two Opinions touching the beginning of the Captivity: with an answer to the errors of Porphyrie, inveighing against St. Matthew and Daniel, upon whom the latter of these Opinions is founded.

Many Commentators, and other Historians and Chronologers find, that the Captivity then began, when Jechonia was carried prisoner into Babylon; eleven years before the final destruction of Jerusalem under Zedekias. This they prove out of divers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plain distinction between the beginning of the Captivity, and utter destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuzaradan, in these words 3. In the fifth and twentieth year of our being in Captivity, in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the City was fallen. In which words he beginneth the Captivity in plain terms, eleven years before the City was destroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion, that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Joakim; which he endeavours to prove out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of Saint Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of disputation, but serve not to make good so much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of Saint Matthew, and the whole Book of Daniel have ministred occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christian Religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who not understanding how the Sons of King Jofas were called by divers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large; thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what, in reckoning the Sons, or according to some Translations, the Son, and Nephews of that good King, begotten about the time of the Captivity. Upon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious Books written against the Christians, affirming, that these prophecies and visions, remembered by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or near the time of Antiochus Epiphanius. This fond supposition of his,

Eusebius,

Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For, the Seventy Interpreters, who converted the Old Testament about an hundred years before Epiphanius, did also turn this Book of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greek, as a part of Scripture received. And, were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who lived divers years before Antiochus Epiphanius. For Jaddus the High Priest shewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Jerusalem to have destroyed it, this Book of Daniel, wherein he beheld his own glory foretold, as the same was plainly expounded unto him; which not only stayed his hand from the harm of that City and people; but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future peril and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Eastern Empire, in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one City, to wit, Tyre in Phenicia.

It is true indeed, that the Jews themselves give less authority to Daniel, than to Moses and the Prophets; accomplishing his Book among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they say Eldras, and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their return from Babylon. But first, that the Book of Daniel (I mean so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonical; secondly, that it was written by Daniel himself, and not by Eldras and the Seniors; we may assure our selves by testimony of Councils and Fathers. For in the Council of Laodicea, held about the year of our Lord 368. after the death of Jovinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Council three and forty years, this Book of Daniel was received, verified and confirmed among the other Canonical Scriptures, as in the Epitomy of the same Council it may be seen; and so doth Melliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witness Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History, the fourth Book, and five and twentieth Chapter: so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonical Books upon Origen: so doth Hilarius in his Preface upon the Psalms, and Epiphanius in his Book of Weights and Measures, &c. To these I may add St. Hierom, Gregory Nazianzene, and others. For, the Hagiographa-Books, or holy Writings, the Jews and Rabbines reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Ester, Ezra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Eldras, that wrote this Book, Gods commandment unto him by his Angel, to seal up the same to the time appointed, is an unanswerable testimony. Yea, that which exceedeth all strength of other proof, our Saviour Christ, who citeth no Apocryphal Scripture, in Matthew and Mark alledgeth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his ninth Chapter. Further, in the fifth of John, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second. Saint Paul describeth Antichrist, out of Daniel; and the Revelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniel's visions.

§. III.

That the Seventy years of Captivity are to be numbered from the destruction of Jerusalem; not from the migration of Jechoniah.

Having thus far digressed in maintaining that authority which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now convenient, that we return unto the differences of opinion concerning the beginning of these seventy years. Neither will I stand to trouble my self and others with laying open the grounds or weaknels of that which Eusebius, and some few nameless Authors, have sometimes held in this point, which is lately revived by Beroaldus; but will forthwith enter into consideration of that opinion, which many, both ancient and late Writers, have so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Juda, were carried away captives to Babylon: First, Manasse; then Jehojakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: Thirdly, Jechonias, and with him Ezekiel: Lastly, Zedekias, at which time the City and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these Captivities, the beginning of the seventy years is referred by none that I have read; to the second, by few, and with weak proof; to the third, by very many, and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered out of Jeremy, which may seem to make the matter plain. For the Prophet, in comforting the people that were carried away with Jechonias, useth these words: Thus saith the Lord, After seventy years be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and perform my good promise towards you, and cause you to return to this place.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seek the interpretation of a Prophecy out of circumstances, when the

Jer. 19. 16, 17.
2. Chron. 36. 19.

Prophecy is such as doth sufficiently expound it self. Jeremy hath already, in the fourth year of Jehojakim, denounced the judgement of God against the Land, for the sins and impenitency of that obstinate people, in these words: *Behold, I will send, and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar the King of Babel, my servants; and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof; and against all these Nations round about; and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continual desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness; the voice of the Bridegroom, and the voice of the Bride; the noise of the mill-stone, and the light of the candle; and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serve the King of Babel seventy years. And when seventy years are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Here we see prescribed unto the Captivity the term of seventy years: which were to commence, neither when the Prophecy was uttered; nor when Jehojakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Jechonia: but with the utter desolation of the City, whereof Jeremy did again give notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such times as he sent them the comfort of deliverance before rehearsed. And so did the people understand this Prophecy, in those times when they saw it accomplished; beginning the seventy years at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the History of Juda, where it is said thus: *They burnt the House of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: and they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were servants to him, and to his Sons, until the Kingdom of the Persians had rule, to fulfil the Word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the days that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfil seventy years. But in the first year of Cyrus King of Persia (when the Word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah, was fulfilled) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. We seldom find one piece of Scripture, so precisely and plainly expounded by another as in this Prophecy, to have afterwards been the subject of alteration. For one can hardly devise how either the Desolation could have been expressed more sensibly, than it was by the Prophet, or the event of the Prophecy have been more exactly set down, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proof in evidence a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yields testimony sufficient, unto this exposition of Jeremiah his Prophecy, that Jerusalem was to lye waste seventy years. For in the first year of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the seventy, Daniel obtained of God the deliverance, that had been promised, by prayer, which he made upon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: In the first year of his reign, I Daniel understood by Books the number of the years whereof the Lord had spoken unto Jeremiah the Prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolation of Jerusalem. So that howsoever the time of Daniel's own Captivity be reckoned from the taking of 'Jehojakim', and that the people carried away with 'Jechonia', did accomplish, as well they might, the years of their own Captivity; yet with the general desolation of the Country, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabit, began in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor the great Captivity, which by Gods appointment continued unto the end of seventy years.

This I will not further seek to prove, by the authority of Josephus and others affirming the same; forasmuch as that which already hath been produced, is enough to satisfy any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrary.

§. IV.

Sundry opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the seventy years.

WHAT Kings reigned in Babylon, during these seventy years of the Captivity, and how long each of them did wear the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know; forasmuch as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they lived, nor the length of their reigns, any way helpful to the concordance of times, foregoing or succeeding. The conquests, recounted by Xenophon, of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part of it) Hircania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seem fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betook himself to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel; for the house of his Kingdom, and for the honour of his Majesty, where it may seem seem that he and his Heirs kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Assyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no less. For, whereas under Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofs) they attempted, and finished that hardy piece of work, of winning the strong City of Tyre, by joining unto it the Continent, filling up the deep and broad channel of the Sea, dividing it from the Main with a mole or piece of Earth, and other matter; the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders works: in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the Enemy than their bows would carry, but were ready to turn their backs as soon as any, though inferior in numbers, adventuring within the distance, offered to charge them.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzar's wars, till the ruin of their Empire, were not worthy to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reign of their several Kings, unworthy of the great labour that hath in vain been taken in that business. For when it is granted, that the Captivity of Judah, ending with that Empire, lasted seventy years, we may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three foolish Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children living in the Egyptians servitude; resting satisfied in both, with the general assured sum.

Yet forasmuch as many have travelled in this business, upon desire (as I take it) to approve the beginning and end of the seventy years, not only by the reigns of other Princes, ruling elsewhere, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves; I will not refuse to take a little pains in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I think may best be held for likely, if the certain truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting down the years of their several reigns. The first, and (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who wearily follow the authority of the Scriptures, without borrowing any help from others. These name only three Kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Ezra, and Balthazar; Neither have they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other, to be their warrant; but the Prophecy of Jeremy precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of the Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his own will, and making it known that he had put some Countreys here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serve him, and his Son, and his Sons Son, until the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serve themselves of him. These words, expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I find no other necessity of qualification to be used herein, than such as may grow out of mens desire, to reconcile the Scriptures unto prophane Authors. And this desire were not unjust, if the consent of all Histories were on the one side, and the letter of the Holy Text were single on the other side.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofs of their different reports, are so slender and insufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not been thus delivered in Scriptures, but only set down by some Author of equal credit with the rest, might very well have found and deserved as good belief, as any of those things which they have delivered in this point. For some there are, who following Josephus, derive that Empire, as by descent, from Father to Son, through five generations, beginning with Nabuchodonosor the Great, and giving to him 43 years; to Ezra 18; to Niglar the Son of Ezra 18; to Labaradach the Son of Niglar 9 months; and lastly, to Balthazar (whom Josephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his Father) 17 years. And this opinion (save that he forbears to reckon the years, and plainly calls Balthazar the Son of Labaradach) Saint Hierom doth follow, alledging Berosus and Josephus as a Se&tor of Berosus, for his Authors; though Berosus, as he is cited by Josephus, report the matter far otherwise. For he tells us, that Ezra did reign but two years, and that his wickedness and lust, slain by his Sisters Husband Nizagisforoor, who occupied the Kingdom after him four years, and left it to his own Son Labaradach; who being an ill-conditioned Boy, was at the end of nine months slain by such as were about him, and the Kingdom given to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it unto Cyrus after 17 years.

years. This relation ill agrees with that of Josephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of years, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, have procured unto them some authority; so that the names which they have inserted, are taken as it were upon trust. There is a third opinion which makes the three last Kings Brethren, and Sons of Evilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather believe Xenophon, who saith, that the last King of Babylon was immediate Successor to his Father. But whereas the Author of the Scholastical History, who is founder of this opinion, placeth between him that took Jerusalem, and Evilmerodach, another Nabuchodonosor: plain enough it is that he hath out of any History faced or prophane, as little warrant to guide him, as we have reason to follow him. Engenius, Sulpitius, Severus, and Theodoret, upon better ground have supposed, that Evilmerodach and Balthasar were brethren and Sons of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fifth Chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (for of Evilmerodach there is none that ever doubted) is often called Nabuchodonosor his Son. And fo common grew this explication, that St. Hierom called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Jeremy before cited, proves that Balthasar was not the Son indeed, but the grand-child of that great Conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Eastern languages, he was called the Son.

Annus his Metasthenes hits very rightly the seventy years of Captivity, giving to Nabuchodonosor 45 years, to Evilmerodach 20 years, and to the three Sons of Evilmerodach, Nephews of Nabuchodonosor, fourteen years; that is, to Reg. Asar the eldest Son, three years; to Lab. Asar-Dach the second Son, six years; and to Balthasar the third Son, five.

To this account agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole sum of years, and in the number of generations, I have sometime subscribed; as not daring to reject an appearance of truth, upon no greater reason, than because the Author was of Annus his edition. Yet could I not satisfie my self herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few such of the Modern Writers as deserve to be regarded, have contented with this Metasthenes; and for that in making Balthasar succeed unto his Brother in the Kingdom, and not unto his Father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose History of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian war I cannot slightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the King was at his drunken feast.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might give any light in this obscurity, I found manifest proof, that the time allotted unto Balthasar by Annus his Metasthenes, was far short of the truth; which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the seventy years he pleased among the rest. For in the third year of Balthasar, Daniel saw a Vision, after which he was sick certain days; but when he rose up, he did the Kings business: from which business, that he did afterwards withdraw himself, and live retired, so long, that he was forgotten in the Court, it appears plainly, both by the many words which the old Queen used to set out his sufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were Daniel. Now to think that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two years have been worn out of remembrance, were in my judgment a very strange conceit; which rather than I would entertain, I can well be contented to think the whole story (thus related) a part of Annus his Impostures.

Out of these reports of Josephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by conjectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the Captivity being 70 years, and these years extending unto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his Son and Grand-child, must have reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the years of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reigns might fill up the whole continuance of the Captivity; with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Evilmerodach and Balthasar, joynted unto the years following the nineteen of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Jerusalem was laid desolate) are nothing even.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the years of Evilmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18 years given to him by Josephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbered 28 years; and the two years that Berosus hath allowed to Evilmerodach, should be written 23. In the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2) and in the latter there should have been added the figure of (3) to that of (2): this granted (to wit) that Evilmerodach reigned 28 years, whereof five together with his Father, and 23 after his death, and the same number of 22 added to the 25 which Nabuchodonosor lived after after the destruction of Jerusalem, make 48, then 4 years of Niglisar, according to Berosus, nine months of Labassardach his Son, and 17 years of Labonidus or Balthasar, make up the number of seventy years to the first of Cyrus. But whether by error in figures, or in words, the numbers be utterly mistaken in all Copies extant; upon how weak a foundation do they build, who having nothing to help them, save only the bare names of two unknown Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as, if they had been entirely extant, were not worthy to have the place of Jeremy called into dispute, in regard of their authority?

§. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reigns of the Babylonian Kings.

Other suppositions, little different in substance from this of Aterator, I purpose to forbear to rehearse, as falling under the same answer. That of Joseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deserving to be considered apart from the rest. He gives to Nebuchadnezzar 44 years, to Evilmerodach two, to Belsazar 5, and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19 of Nebuchadnezzar, in which Jerusalem was destroyed, unto the time of Cyrus, he accounted only 59 years; beginning (as many do) the Captivity 11 years sooner, from the transportation of Jechonia. But heretofore hath been said already, That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running between the 19 of Nebuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Chaldean Empire: wherein if he have erred, then is all further inquisition frivolous.

Concerning the length of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, I shall hereafter upon better occasion deliver my opinion. The time which he gives to Evilmerodach is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For we find in Jeremy, that this Evilmerodach in the first of his reign, shewing all favour to Jechonia, did, among other things, take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eat bread before him all the days of his life. His portion was a continual portion given him of the King of Babel, every day a certain, all the days of his life until he died. The very found of these words (which is more to be esteemed than the authority of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) imports a far longer time than two years, wherein Jechonia, under this gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandment he had obeyed in yielding himself to Nebuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Jechonia did live, it cannot be proved; but plain it is hereby, that all his remaining days he did eat bread before this King. Now that he lived not so short a while after this as two years, it is more than likely; for he was but 55 years when he was set at liberty, having been 37 years in the prison, whereto he was cast at the age of 18 years; after which time it seems plain that he begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zerobabel, who is said to have been but a young man, and one of Darius his Pages, threescore years after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it self.

Of Belsazar, to whom Scaliger gives the next five years, naming him also Laborassardach, I should wonder why he calls him Nebuchadnezzar's daughter's son, were it not that herein I find him very careful to help out Berosus, by shifting in his Niriglisaroor, as husband to Nebuchadnezzar's daughter, and Protector of his son four of these years; by which means there remains about one year to Belsazar alone, agreeing nearly with the nine months assigned by Berosus to the son of Niglisar. But Jeremy hath told us, that it was to Nebuchadnezzar's daughter, and to his sons (not to his daughters son) that the Empire was promised: which difficulty, if Scaliger could not help, it was well done of him to pass it over with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these, whom others (desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) have judged to be all one with Balthasar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Aedes. But herein Scaliger is no firm Berosus: for Berosus makes him of the same stock or race, a Babylonian. I speak not this to disgrace the travel of that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and judgement, that he was not so wedded to any Author, as affected with the love of truth) but to shew that he himself, having in some points disliked those Writers, whom in general he approveth, might with greater reason have wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirm this opinion in Scaliger, that he whom Berosus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Aedes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies unto us, that Darius took the Kingdom, not saying that he warr it by force of arms: Secondly, a fragment of Metasthenes found in Engenius, wherein this Nabonidus bonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Original, or of the Greek translation, which, expressing no force of arms, doth only signify that Darius took or received the Kingdom; I see no reason why we should thereupon infer, that the next King entred by Election: seeing Daniel relateth not the means and circumstances of Balthasars death, but only the swift accomplishment of his own Prophecy. Neither could it indeed have properly been said (if Daniel had cared to use the most expressive terms) that Darius of the Medes, breaking into the City, did win the Kingdom: seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his use. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his works Printed at Basil, in the year 1559, I find only thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alphexus; That Nabuchodonosor was more valiant than Hercules; that he subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia, as far as to the Armenians; and that, as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his Kingdom, and rapt with a divine fury, he cried with a loud voice: O Babylonians, I foretell ye of a great calamity that shall come upon you, which neither Bell, nor any of the gods shall avert: There will come a Persian, half an Ass, that shall bring slavery upon you: and that, and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I believe little or nothing, saving that Nabuchodonosor knew before-hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold, from the golden head, to the silver breast. But that he wan all Africa or Lybia, I do hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaliger Copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells us, that Nabuchodonosor wan both Africa and Spain, I believe the fragment so much the less; and am as little moved with the authority of it, where it calls a Median, the pride and confidence of the Assyrians; as where it tells of Nebuchadnezzar his own vanishing away. Indeed that same title (of half an Ass) by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable, as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his parentage was more noble on the Mothers side than on the Fathers; as Mules are begotten by Asses upon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principal foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it had within itself, I easily allow it. But this proves nothing; for meer fictions have not wanted these commendations: neither can any man believe that one so judicious, industrious, and deeply learned as Joseph Scaliger, would overthrow himself, in setting down repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeal. And herein it seems that Scaliger, well knowing his own sufficiency, hath been little careful to satisfy men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the Prophecy of Daniel were true, that the Kingdom of Balthasar was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians; either we must think that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else we must bethink our selves what Persian it might be that shared the Kingdom with him. For it is not more certain, that Balthasar lost his life and Kingdom, then that his Kingdom was divided and given to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as, by supposing Nabonidus to have been Darius, they should be thought to have done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords over all the subject Provinces; inasmuch that the Greek Historians did commonly call those wars which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made upon Greece, The wars of the Medes. Yea, to clear this point, even Daniel himself resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, unto a Ramm with two horns, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to have been condemned by Joseph Scaliger, for maintaining upon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes was partner with Cyrus, in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Josephus to be the less regarded, for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his Nephew Cyrus; though herein he varied from Berosus and others, whose authority elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Josephus had no reason to believe any mans faith or knowledge of those times half so well as Daniels, whom I believe that he understood as far as was needful in this case. Lawful it was for him to alleadge all Authors that had any mention, though imperfect, of the same things that were contained in the writings of the Jews, to whose Histories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were strangers, and might seem fabulous. Even so do Eusebius and other Writers willingly embrace the testimonies of Heathen books making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore be tried in general by the self-same Ethnick Philosophers, phers, but leave them where they are against the truth; as Josephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meet to say of *Scaliger*s opinion in this point; holding nevertheless in due regard his learning and judgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had then been very great.

S. VI.

What may be held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor his successors.

IT now remains that I freely acknowledge mine own weakness, who cannot find how the seventy years of Captivity are to be divided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I find that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly say with Petrus; that we ought liberally to pardon those whose feet have failed them in the slippery waies of Chronology, wherein both learning and diligence are subject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulness, or heedless reckoning. Yet will I adventure to deliver my opinion, wherein the judgement of Lyra and others (holding those only to have reigned over the Chaldeans, whose names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Conjectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take upon me to defend Lyra his Conjectures, when he supposeth by Niglisar and Laborsadach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Evilmerodach and Balthasar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but only to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of seventy years. First therefore let us consider the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth year Jersusalem was taken and sacked, but in his nineteenth laid utterly desolate. Most of Writers have given to him 43 years of reign, following therein Berosus. There are who have added one year more; and some have made it up 45. To dispute about the certainty were needless: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certain truth.

Manifest it is, that the 19 year of Nebuchadnezzar, is joyned with the 11 of Zedechias also that his eighth year, was the first year of Jechonia his Captivity; the reign of Zedechias occupied all the mean space, being of 11 years. This is generally agreed upon, so that it needs no further proofs: As for the beginning of his successor Evilmerodach, it was in the seven and thirtieth year of Jechonia his Captivity; so that Nebuchadnezzar after his eighth year (which was the first of Jechonia his bondage) reigned 35 whole years, and peradventure a good part of the six and thirtieth, so far as much as Jechonia was enlarged with so great a favour, not until the end of the year. Subtracting therefore out of these four and forty, which *Nebuchadnezzar*s reign did well-near occupy, those eighteen years of his which passed away before the captivity of Juda, and ruin of the City, we have remaining six and twenty years of the Seventy, that were almost wholly spent when his Son began to reign.

It is now to be considered, how the remainder of the seventy years were divided between the Kings ruling in Babylon until the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needful: the whole sum being certain, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were slothful Princes. Neither can any man the more justly suspect the beginning or end of the whole seventy years; for that the distribution of some part of them is only conjectural; seeing that none who gives any other terms to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both unlikely and desperate conjectures in dividing them. I will therefore be bold to do as others have done; knowing well before-hand, that whosoever shall discover my error, must do me the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more material) of making me to understand the truth.

Of the four and forty years remaining in account of *Nebuchadnezzar*s death, we are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then having authority good enough to warrant us from blame of presumption, giving us seventeen years to Balthasar, we find left in our hands to bestow upon Evilmerodach six and twenty years. Of the year belonging unto Darius the Mede, I have already spoken what I thought sufficient, in delivering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this Captivity. That Balthasar did reign seventeen years, we have the authority of Josephus before cited in express words: We have also the general consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who reigned so long, and Balthasar to have been one. But nothing moved me so much

Ex. 17. 9.
Gen. 15. 11.
Is. 63. 13.

to believe this Tradition, as first those evident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third year of Balthazar he followed the Kings business, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his reign, (a proof sufficient of no few years, passing under this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniel's employments took end either that year or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his wars against the Affrians, which beginning with the death of this mans Father, and being always prosperous, could hardly have occupied any longer time; though we make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Asia, which fell out in the mid-way: I have already shewed, that there appears in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the reign of Ezra Merodach was not short, and that men of great judgement have found it most probable, that he was a King three and twenty years. More, I think, they would have allowed him, had not the delight of satisfying Berosus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that Books of such antiquity, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yield in many dark passages of Antiquity. I will yet confess, that were his works never so excellent, and in all things else unquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend unto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemy: How much less ought I obey a broken fragment of his, containing only seven or eight lines, and part even of the title corrupted, as they believe that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures have told us, that God gave the Empire to Nabuchodonosor, to his Son, and to his Sons Son: How long each of them held it, we find not Expressed; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would teach us, provided always, that helping us in a particularity, he destroyed not thereby the general truth. More words are needless. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus, or Josephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelessness of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to err in writing two for six and twenty, as for three and twenty, or perhaps more easie. For, the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5, signifying 6, hath a nearer resemblance of 6 than it stands for, 2, than hath 7 which is used for 3. So that the numeral notes 25, expressing 26, were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true Copy, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not unusual, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seem not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in Ez, standing for 23, I do not well perceive. As for the Arithmetical figures now in use, they were long after the time of Josephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore do not appertain unto this business; unless we should guess that his works were corrupted in that unlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanity, but in a sort wholly given over to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serve to make Berosus our friend, let it be; If not, I will not purchase the favour of his authority, by forsaking Jeremy and Daniel when they seem to be his Opposites.

Of the Victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained between the destruction of Jerusalem, and conquest of Egypt.

With what actions this time of seventy years was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few have written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peradventure have been some cause that the time it self was, and is yet, sought to be abridged, as not having left sufficient matter to witness the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well deny to many people even their Being. For every Nation (I know not whom I should except between the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slothful age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no marvel, if the posterity of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things ready to their hand, which their hearts could have desired, betook themselves to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigal Sons of greedy Fathers, their own wisdom greater, which knew how to enjoy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their daies in the restless travel of purchasing: Though indeed the reign of Nabuchodonosor was so divided, that his youthful and stronger years having been exercised in victorious arms, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthy labours past. The nineteenth year of his reign it was, when destroying utterly the great and mighty City of Jerusalem, he enriched riched himself with abundance of spoil, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearful example. From that time forward, he, until his three and twentieth year, laboured in the conquest of those adjoining Regions, which God had exposed unto his sword, and commanded to wear his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sydotians, and Egyptians; though some of these were already become his followers, and served under him, when Jerusalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians, whose City was founded on an Island, safe enough from any danger of a Land-army, and whose Fleet was so strong, that they needed not to fear any enemy at Sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour-Cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mighty Prince, employing all his power to their subversion.

That the City of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Jerusalem (which had held the same course that Tyrus did, and endured all that might be in the same quarrel against the common enemy) it appears by the words which Ezekiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrus; Aha, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned unto me; for seeing the isle is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at length, even in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, that great work of his, whereof we have already spoken, began to appear above the waters, and threaten them with inevitable mischief.

But those Prophecies of Jeremy and of Ezekiel, which appoint unto this desolation of Tyre the same term of seventy years, that was prescribed unto the reign of the Chaldeans, do plainly shew, that the fall of Jerusalem, the same nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doublets were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner utterly lost. Thus much we find, That the Citizens perceiving the Town unable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fled into the Isle of Cyprus. Nevertheless, it seems that this evasion served only the principal men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort unto the enemies fury. For, not only such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent, (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excessive labour, the Affrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonosor caused his Army to serve a great service against Tyrus, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare, yet had he no wages, nor his Army; but was fain to rest contented with the Honour of having destroyed that City, which in all mens judgements had been held invincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerful Cities, having made the name of the Chaldeans dreadful in the ears of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor used the advantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with less pain. The Kingdom of Egypt was the Mark at which he aimed; a Country so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might well have tempted any Prince, finding himself strong enough, to seek occasion of quarrel against it; and so far an enemy to the Crown of Babylon, that, had it been poorer, yet either it must have been subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill have been established. Nevertheless it was needful, that before he entered into this business, the Countries adjacent should be reduced unto such terms, that either they should wholly stand at his devotion, or at least be unable to work him any displeasure. And herein the Decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of State. For, the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazar, and other adjoining Regions, whom God for their sins had condemned to fall under the Babylonian swords, were such, as regarding only their own gain, had come to them, like Ravens, followed the Chaldean Army, to feed upon the carcases that fell by the cruelty thereof; others taking advantage of their neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor: all of them thinking, that when the Affrian had satisfied his fury, he should be fain to forsake those desolate parts, and leave the possession of those that could lay hand upon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philistines had shewed much malice to the Jews when their City was taken. What good service they had done to the Chaldeans, I find not; if they did any, it is likely to have been with reference to their own purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to rejoice at the fall of Jerusalem, but presently they entered upon the Country of Gad, and took possession; as if not the Affrians, but they had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceive what other ground that practice had of Baal's King of the Ammonites, when he sent Ishmael, a Prince of the blood of Juda, to murder Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Governour over those that remained in Israell, and to carry captive into the Ammonites Country the people that abode in Mizpab, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor, with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his own Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himself and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like policy the Moabites did exercise, whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God; and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these Nations had the art of ravening, which is familiar to such as live or border upon deserts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the uttermost cunning of their theevish wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their devices by sharp and sudden war, overwhelming them with unexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the Prophecies of Ezay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, who foretold, with little difference of words, the greatness and swiftness of the misery that should come upon them. With which of them he first began, I find not; it seems that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so do many good Authors interpret the Prophecy of Ezay, threatening Moab with destruction after three years, as having reference to the third year following the ruine of Jerusalem; the next year after it being spent in the Egyptian Expedition. This is manifest, that all the principal Towns in these Regions were burnt, and the people slain, or made slaves, few excepted, who being preserved by flight, had not the courage to return to their habitations over-hastily, much less to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor; but lived as miserable Out-laws, or at least oppressed wretches, until the end of seventy years, which God had prescribed unto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Juda.

§. VIII.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slain by Nabuchodonosor, contrary to the opinion of most Authors: who, following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwise.

When by a long course of victory, Nabuchodonosor had brought into subjection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in such wise, that no enemy to himself, nor friend to the Egyptian, was left at his back, that might give impediment upon his proceeding, or take advantage of any misfortune; then did he forthwith take in hand the conquest of Egypt himself, upon which those other Nations had formerly been depending. Of this Expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets, Ezay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, have written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needless to look after more authority, or to cite for proof half of that which may be alleaged out of these. Nevertheless, we find many and good Authors, who following Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to strain these Prophecies with unreasonable diligence unto such a sense, as gives to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of having done some spoil in Egypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a Chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affairs. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the means and second helps conducing to their purpose, that oftentimes they do prefer the Commentator before the Author; and, to uphold a sentence, giving testimony to one clause, do carelessly overthrow the History it self, which thereby they sought to have maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former Book: but that which they have spoken of Apries, was purposely reserved unto this place. Herodotus doth affirm, that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (unless we should understand that he was victorious in the War, which he is said to have made upon Tyrrus and Sydon) that he reigned five and twenty years; and was finally taken and put to death by his own Subjects; who did set up Amasis, as King, which prevailed against him. The rebellion of the Egyptians he imputeth to a great loss which they received in an Expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Army was destroyed. This calamity the people of Egypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous Expedition, with a purpose to have them consumed, that so he might with greater security reign over such as stayed at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slain, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appease the tumult; but Amasis became Captain of the rebels, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land

Land consented unto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to trust unto his foreign Mercenaries; the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept continually in readiness thirty thousand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were at length vanquished by the great number of the Egyptian forces, amounting unto two hundred and fifty thousand, which were all by birth and education, men of War. Apries himself being taken prisoner, was gently entreated by Amasis for a while, until the Egyptians, exclaiming upon him, as an extreme enemy to the Land, got him delivered into their hands, and strangled him, yet they gave him honourable burial. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus doth nearly agree, telling us, that Apries did vanquish the Cyprians and Phenicians in battle at Sea, took by force and demolished Sidon, warr the other Towns of Phenicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally perished, as is before rehearsed, when he had reigned two and twenty years. This authority were enough (yet not more than enough) to inform us of Apries his history, if greater authority did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonian, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our belief, than have the traditions of Egyptian Priests (which the Greek Historians followed) and greater probabilities to persuade those that look only into humane reasons. For Ezay prophesied long before of the shameful Captivity of the Egyptians, whom the King of Assur, should carry away naked, young and old, in such wise, that the Jews, who fled then for deliverance from the Assyrians, should be ashamed of their own vain confidence in men so unable to defend themselves.

But Ezekiel and Jeremy, as their Prophecies were nearer to the time of execution, so they handled this argument more precisely. For Ezekiel telleth plainly, that Egypt should be given to Nebuchadnezzar, as wages for the service which he had done at Tyre: Also he recounteth particularly all the chief Cities in Egypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed, and go into Captivity; yea, that Pharaoh and all his Army should be slain by the sword. Wherefore it must needs be a violent exposition of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such threatenings to an insurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succeed unto Apries, by force indeed, but by the uniform consent of all the people. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremy, wherein he foretelleth how the Jews in Egypt should see Pharaoh Hophra delivered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had been, were to be referred unto the time of that rebellion, whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the general opinion hath over-ruled it; then was it vainly done of the same Prophet (which, God forbid that any Christian should think, seeing he did it by the appointment of God himself) to hide in the clay of a Brick-hill, those very stones, upon which the Throne of Nabuchadnezzar should be set, and his Pavilion spread. Yea then was that Prophecy no other than false, which expressed the end of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will visit the common people of No, and Pharaoh and Egypt, with their gods, and their Kings, even Pharaoh, and all that trust in him: and I will deliver them into the hands of those that seek their lives, and into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of his servants. The clearness of this Prophecy being such as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it; who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greek Historians. Wherefore looking upon Junius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amasis and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Egyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus with lyes, coynd upon a vain-glorious purpose of hiding their own disgrace and bondage. And surely, it may well be thought, that the history of Nebuchadnezzar was better known to the Jews, whom it concerned, than to the Greeks, that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather believe Josephus, reporting that Nabuchodonosor in the three and twentieth year of his reign, and the fifth year of the destruction of Jerusalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Herodotus or Diodorus; who being meer strangers to this business, had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all advantage of authority, we should only consider the relations of Josephus, and of the Greek Historians, as either of them might be verified of it self by apparent circumstances, without reflecting upon the Hebrew Prophets, or Egyptian Priests; methinks the death of Apries can no way be approved, as having having been wrought by consent of the people, but affords great matter of suspicion, yea, though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the great love and honour which the Egyptians did bear unto their Kings, is notorious by the uniform testimony of all others that have handled the matters of that Country, as well as by the report of Diodore himself. How then can we think it probable, that Apries having won great victories, did for one only loss fall into the hatred of all his people? or, which may serve to persuade us, that a King of Egypt would seek, or so demean himself, that he might be thought to seek the destruction of his natural subjects? As for that Army of thirty thousand soldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of Egypt, whom Amasis took prisoner, is said to have kept for his defence: Doth it not argue that he was a forreiner, and one that armed himself against the Egyptians, wishing them few and weak; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their own, as the strength of their own bodies? It were more tedious than any way needful, to use all Arguments that might be alledged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that he was some foreign Governour, not a natural Prince; otherwise the people would have desired to save his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, wherunto I should not have yielded, though it had stood upon great appearance of truth, considering that the voice of truth it self cries out against it; but leave the circumstances, proving the Conquest of Egypt by Nabuchodonosor, to be observed where due occasion in course of the story following shall present them.

How Egypt was subdued and held by Nebuchadnezzar.

IT is a great loss, that the general History of the World hath suffered by the spoil and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments that should have preserved the memory of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mighty Prince Nabuchodonosor; wherein, whether his Virtue, or Fortune were greater, it is now uncertain. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Provinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all the former Wars had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth up in his 30 Chapter (besides the whole Country of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations, that may seem to have reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these Wars are in a manner utterly lost; but that the victory was easie and swift, any man shall find, who will take the pains to confer the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I think worthy of more particular observation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Book) thought himself most safe in Egypt by the well defended situation of his Country, did very unwisely in suffering his enemies to sweep the way clean unto his own doors, by consuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For, as the labour of this business did more harden, than weary the Chaldean Army; so the confidence and vain security of the Egyptians, relying upon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make thorow the Arabian deserts, and the much advantage which the great River of Nilus would afford unto themselves, did little avail them in provision for the War, and much astonish them (as may justly be thought) in the time of execution: it being usually seen, that the hearts of men fail, when those helps fail, in which they had reposed more confidence, than in their own virtue. Hitherto the Kingdom of Egypt had flourished under the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand five hundred and fourscore years; but from this time forward it remained forty years without a King, under the subjection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recover by little and little the former greatness; yet so, that it was never dreadful unto others; God having said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule the Nations. For, whereas it hath been said of Pharaoh: I am the Son of the Wife, I am the Son of the Ancient Kings; And whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I have made it; the Princes of Egypt now became fools, the River failed them, the King himself was taken and slain, and that ancient lineage quite extinguished. This came to pass in the first year after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar; at which time (saith Josephus) He slew the King then reigning, placed another in his room, and carried Captives thence to Babylon the Jews whom he found in that Country. Now concerning cerning the time which Josephus gives unto this business, and the business it self, I have already shewed, that it is warranted by all the Prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Jerusalem, and carrying away thence unto Babel; who inhabited the miserable ruins of that great City, which was in the same three and twentieth year of Nebuchadnezzar, is not improbably thought by good Authors to have been at the return from this Egyptian Expedition. But whereas Josephus tells us, that there was another King put in the room of Apries by Nebuchadnezzar, we must understand, that he was only a Vice-roy, and not (as some have mistaken it) think that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his reign in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant unto the prophecies before alledged, as to all Chronology and History. Some there are, which to help this inconvenience, imagine that there were two successively bearing the name of Amasis; others, that there were two Apries, the one slain by Nebuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis; a question of small importance, because the difference is only about a name, it being once granted, that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of life and Kingdom by the Assrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceive, that Apries, of whom the Greek Historians wrote, could not be the Deputy of Nebuchadnezzar, seeing that he was the Grand-child of Pharaoh Necho, and made war (as they report) upon the Phenicians; who were, before the Egyptians, become subject unto the Crown of Babylon. I might add, perhaps, that he whom Nebuchadnezzar left as Governour of Egypt, was more likely to have had some Chaldean or Assrian, than Egyptian name, unless we should think that he had been a Traitor to his natural Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Country: about which it were but frivolous to dispute. Thus much in brief we ought to believe, that Nabuchodonosor made an absolute Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so foolish as to give it away, any man may guess; that he appointed one to rule the Country, it is consequent unto the former, and hath authority of Josephus; that his Governour (or some successor of his) was afterwards taken and slain by Amasis, I see probability enough to persuade myself, and yet can well be content, that others use their liberty, and believe what they list. As for the Army which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to have kept of Ionians and Carians, I hold them to be none other than the garrisons of mercenary souldiers which were left by the Assrian for the guard of his Vice-roy, and custody of the new subdued Province: as likewise the company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who, together with the friends of such as were slain in that Expedition, remembered before out of the Greek Historians, deposed and slew Apries. I take them to have been the Egyptian fugitives, which then recovered their own Country. Sure it is, that this Prophecy of Ezekiel was verified; At the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the people where they were scattered, and I will bring again the Captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to return into the Land of Pathros, into the Land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small Kingdom. If the Egyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amasis obtaining the Kingdom; then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they devised matter that had no shadow of truth, only to keep the Greeks from knowledge of their Countries disgrace, then are they little to be regarded, since we know the truth with them.

Of the sundry accounts drawn from sundry acts of Nebuchadnezzar, and of the destruction of Ninive, by him; the time of which action is uncertain.

THESE victories brought the greatness of the Assrian Empire to the full, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzar's reign in sundry places of Scripture. To speak any more of the questions arising about the supposition of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might seem to be the over-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note, that whereas Daniel was carried captive in the third year of Jehojakims reign (which ran along with some part of Nebuchadnezzar's first year) and was kept in diet three years more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; It could not be the second of Nebuchadnezzar's Kingdom, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dream of the great Image, fore-telling the success of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The fame or the like may be said of divers places which refer sundry matters unto their set years; as that of Ezekiel before-cited, where he fore-tells, that Egypt should be given in reward for the service done before Tyrus, dating his Prophecy in the the seven and twentieth year; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth year: for these years held no dependence upon either the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's Kingdom, or of his Empire, nor yet upon any of the Captivities, but had reference to some memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not eafie to be found, nor worth the labour of uncertain search.

Of any War made by Nebuchadnezzar, after fuch time as he returned from the Conquest of Egypt, I do not read: excepting that againft Nineve, the deftruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Nahum. Nineve had long before been taken by Mero-dach (as in due place hath been fhewed) and together with the reft of Affria made fubject to Babylon. Yet was it left under a peculiar King, who, rebelling againft the Chaldean, as Jehoakim and Zedechias, tributary Kings of Juda, had done, tafted like wife of the fame fortune. That the deftruction of Nineve followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appeareth by the comparifon which Nahum the Prophet made between this City, that was to fall, and the City of No in Egypt, that was fallen already. But, how long after this came to pafs, it is (methinks) impoffible to find out. For, whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronology, that it was in the firft of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, the place of Nahum laft cited, it is enough to difprove it. Whereas it is referred by fome unto the firft of his Monarchy, which began at the end of the Egyptian Wars; the whole Prophecy of Nahum, which went between the one and the other, argueth ftrongly, that there was a longer fpace of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very year of this deftruction, or other circumftances of the War, whether managed by Nabuchodonofor in perfon, or by his Lieutenants, were fomewhat like unto the vain curiofity of Tiberius Cafar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba; or to the like idle pains which he fhould take, who would feek to learn what woman that Hecubaz Queen of Nineve was, whole woful Captivity the fame Prophet Nahum likewife did fore-tell.

Of the latter time of Nebuchadnezzar; his buildings, madnefs, and death.

OF the time which this great Monarch fpent in quiet, I think there are no Monuments extant, fave thofe which we find among the Prophecies of Daniel. Among thefe we may reckon his great works of Babylon, wherewith he pleafed himfelf fo well, that he brake out into thofe glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I have built, for the houfe of the Kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Majefty? Surely if thofe things be true that are by Josephus rehearfed of him out of Be-rofus and Megafthenes, he might well delight himfelf with the contemplation of fuch goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is faid, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that, befides other ftately works, he raifed thofe huge Arches wherewith were born up the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the Air, and equalling the tops of Mountains; which moft fumptuous Frame, that out-lafted all the remainder of the Affrian, and all the Persian Empire, is faid to have been reared, and finifhed in fifteen daies.

But of all this and other his magnificence, we find little elfe recorded, than that (which indeed is moft profitable for us to confider) his over-valuing of his own greatness abafed him unto a condition inferior to the poorft of men. And not underfervedly fell thefe judgments of God upon him. For, whereas God had honoured him, not only with many victories, and much happinefs in his own life, but with a difcovery of things to come after him, yea and had approved the certainty of his dream, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet; he nevertheless became fo forgetful of God, whole wonderful power he had feen and acknowledged, that he caufed a golden Image to be fet up and worfhipped; ordaining a cruel death as reward unto them that fhould dare to difobey his Kingly will and pleafure, which was utterly repugnant to the Law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof St. Hierom hath well noted; velax obliuio vertit, ut qui dudum fervum Dei quafi Deum adoraverat, nunc statum fuis fieri jubet, ut ipse quafi Deus in statua adoraretur: A bafy forgetfulnefs; of the truth, that he who fo lately had worfhipped (Daniel) the fervant of God, as if he had been God himfelf, fhould now command a statua to be erected unto himfelf, wherein himfelf might be worfhipped as God. From this impiety it pleafed God to reclaim him, by the ftrange and wonderful delivery of thofe bleffed Saints out of the fiery furnace; who being thrown into it bound, for refufing to commit Idolatry, were affifted by an Angel; preferved from all harm of the fire; loofened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious gracious words, and reftored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this devotion of Nebuchadnezzar, was not fo rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answerable to his hafty zeal. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dream of the terrible judgement hanging over his head, which Daniel expounding, advifed him to break off his fin by righteoufnefs, and his iniquity by mercy towards the poor, that there might be an healing of his error. Hereby it feems that injuftice and cruelty were the faults, for which he was threatened: but this threatening fufficed not unto his information. For, that fo great a Monarch fhould be driven from among men (according to the tenor of the dream and interpretation); yea, compelled to dwell with the beafts of the field, and made to eat grafs as the Oxen, was a thing fo incredible in mans judgement, that eafily it might be thought an idle dream; and much more eafily be forgotten at the years end. One whole years leifure to repent, was given to this haughty Prince: which refpite of the execution may feem to have bred in him a forgetfulnefs of Gods fentence. For at the end of twelve moneths, walking in the royal Palace of Babel, he was fo over-joyed and transported with a vain contemplation of his own feeming happinefs, that, without all fear of Gods heavy judgement pronounced againft him, he uttered thofe lofty words before rehearfed, in vaunting of the Majeftical works which he had reared, as well befeeming his Majeftical perfon. But his high fpeeches were not fully ended, when a voice from Heaven, telling him that his Kingdom was departed from him, rehearfed over unto him the fentence again, which was fulfilled upon him the very fame hour.

That Solomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, have taken delight in their own buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I do not remember that ever I have read of any, that were punifhed for rejoycing in works of this kind (though it is hard in joy, or any paffion of the mind, to keep a juft meafure) excepting only this Nebuchadnezzar.

The like may befaid of David: for other (and fome very godly) Kings have muftred all their forces to the very laft man; but few or none have been known to have been punifhed as David was. Surely I not only hold it lawful to rejoyce in thofe good things wherewith God hath bleffed us; but a note of much unthankfulnefs to entertain them with a fullen and unfeeling difpofition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reverence to God is wanting, are no better than obfcure clouds hindring the influence of that bleffed Light, which clarifies the foul of man, and predifpofeth it unto the brightnefs of eternal felicity; fo that inolent joys, which man in the pride of his vain imagination conceiveth of his own worth, doth above all other paffions blaft our minds, as it were with lightning, and make us to reflect our thoughts upon our feeing inherent Greatnefs, forgetting the whifft him, to whom we are indebted for our very Being. Wherefore thefe Mala mentis gaudia, The evil joys of the mind were not unaptly, by the Prince of Latin Poets, beftowed upon the entrance of Hell, and placed farther inward than frowns, cares, and fears; not far from the Iron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no unlikely token of vengeance near at hand, when thefe unreafonable flufhes of proud and vain joy, do rage in a mind, that fhould have been humbled with a juft repentance, and acknowledgement of ill deferving.

This was verified upon Nebuchadnezzar, whole punifhment was fingular and unexampled. For he ran among beafts in the fields and woods, where for feven years he lived, not only as a favage man, but as a favage beaft; for a beaft he thought himfelf, fecundum fuam imaginationem, as Thomas l. 2. de Reg. pri. noteth, and therefore fed himfelf in the fame manner, and with the fame food that beafts do: Not that he was changed in figure external, according to Mediana, in fomuch as he appeared a Beaft to other mens eyes; as St. Hierom in the life of Hilarius (how true God knows) fpeaks of a woman that appeared to all other mens fight a Cow, but to Hilarius only a woman; neither was he changed as Ipbigenia the daughter of Agamemnon was faid to be, into a Hind; nor made a Monster, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but, according to St. Hierom's l. 2. de expofitione expofition of thefe words, At the fame time was my underftanding reftored unto me, &c. Quando dicit (faith St. Hierom) fenfuum fuis redditum, offendit non formam, fe aniffie fed mentem; When he faith that his fenfe was reftored unto him, he fhewed that he had not loft his humane fhape, but his underftanding. Seven years expired, it pleafed God to reftore Nabuchodonofor, both to his underftanding, and his eftate, for which he acknowledged and praifed God all the reft of his life, confeffing his power and everlafting benignity that he was the Lord of Heaven and Earth; and wrought wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his ways righteous. Which gave argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his salvation; namely St. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Ezra the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforementioned Authors apply the fame to Balthazar; because Ezra, both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapters, speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon jointly.

§. XII.
Of Evilmerodach.

HAVING already spoken what I could of the succession and years of Nebuchadnezzar's posterity, the most that may be said of him, is said of Evilmerodach, which I will not here again rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten; and left his Kingdom burning in a war that consumed it to ashes. He lost Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth year of his reign, which was forty years after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the account of Herodotus, who allows to Amasis four and forty years of reign; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fifty, saying, that he died in the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but seven and thirty years, which passed between the second year of the four and fiftieth Olympiad (which was the nineteenth of Evilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fifth of Cambyses his reign, wherein he waned Egypt; of which seven and thirty years it is credibly held, that Pammeniticus, the Son of Amasis, reigned three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than four and thirty years. But seeing that these two Greek Historians have been abused by Egyptian Priests in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no marvel though they were also deceived in the length of his reign. This is the plain answer to this objection. For to say, either that the numbers were mis-written, and four and forty set down instead of four and thirty; or that Amasis did temporize a while with the Affrians; and not bear himself as absolute King of Egypt, until the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proved out of Ezekiel, that Egypt became again a Kingdom) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Egyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes, to deal with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces, or whether (as I rather think) some foil received by the Affrians invading Media, emboldened the Egyptians to rebel against him, I will neither undertake, nor seek to define. Xenophon tells, that the first service of young Cyrus in war, was under Affyages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Affrian Prince, who did set upon him; at which time, Cyrus was fifteen or sixteen years old. If therefore Cyrus lived threescore and three years (as he is said to have died well stricken in years) which is held to be the ordinary terme of no short life, then was this encounter in the third year of Evilmerodach his reign. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the war began more early between these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gave courage unto those that had felt him a troublesome neighbour, to stand upon proud terms with the Affrians, than in his flourishing estate they durst have used. Howsoever the quarrel began, we find that it ended not before the last ruin of the Affrian Monarchy. For the Babylonians, being too proud to digest the losses which he received by the Medes, and their Allies the Persians, drew unto his party the Lydians, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong persuasions, hoping so to overwhelm his enemies with a strong Invasion, whom in vain he had fought to weary out with a lingering War.

This happened after the death of Affyages, who left the world in the nineteenth year of Evilmerodach, at which time Amasis took possession of Egypt. So that the Affrian having his hands already full of business, which more earnestly did affect him, seems thereby to have given the better means unto the Egyptians, of new erecting their Kingdom, which by long distance of place, did sundry times find occasion to rebel in after-ages, and set up a King within itself, against the far more mighty Persian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Evilmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way until the fulfilling of those Prophecies, which were many years before uttered against Babel, by Ezra and Jeremy.

For,

For, the Affrians and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to have buried the Medes and Persians under their thick showers of arrows and darts, were encountered with an Army of stout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battle, wherein Evilmerodach was slain. So, that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raised and upheld, being shaken and grievously cracked under his unfortunate Son, was left to be sustained by his unworthy Nephew; a man more likely to have overthrown it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repair it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

A private conjecture of the Author; serving to make good those things, which are cited out of Berosus, concerning the Successors of Evilmerodach, without wrong to the truth. The quality, and death of Balthazar.

THOUGH I have already (as it seems to me) sufficiently proved that Balthazar was the Son, and immediate Successor to Evilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the conjectures of those Writers, which, following Berosus, insert Nightsar, or Nightsaroor, and his Son Labassardach between them; as also that which I find in Herodotus of Nitocris, a famous Queen of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that City; I have thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what means it was possible, that some error might have crept into the History of those times, and thereby have brought us to a needless trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle-light, in the uncertain fragments of lost Authors, which we might have found by day-light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First therefore I observe, that the time which Berosus divides betwixt Evilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the years in which Nebuchadnezzar lived wild among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the fuddeness of this accident, which came in one hour, could not but work much perturbation in that State, wherein doubtless the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamity pitied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause which promised his recovery, as being verified in that which had been more incredible. Now if we do in common reason judge, what course was like to be taken by the great Ones of the Kingdom, for settling the Government, whilst the King was thus distracted, we shall find it most likely, that his Son and Heir did occupy the Royal Throne, with condition to restore it unto his Father, when God should enable him to repel it. In this his rule Evilmerodach being to supply the utter want of understanding in his Father, as Protectors do the unripe ones of it in young, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small ability of Government, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when he held it in his own right. That his Sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his Sister) was an woman of a high spirit; it appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying, That she was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and useful works about the River of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Towns from the Affrians, and amongst them Nimvee. Wherefore it were not unreasonable to think, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her Brothers mis-government, used practices to get the rule into her own hands, and afterwards, as a Mother, to leave it unto her ungracious Son. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could have reigned, we do not find; but we find in Berosus (as Josephus hath cited him) that Nightsar, who got the Kingdom from Evilmerodach, was his Sister's Husband; which argues this to have been the same woman. As for Labassardach the Son of Nightsar; if at the end of nine months reign he were for his low conditions slain by the Nobility, as the same Berosus reporteth; it seems that God prepared hereby the way for Nebuchadnezzar's restitution (whose term of punishment was then expired) by raising such trouble, as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here use many words to confute that which Berosus hath further set down of Evilmerodach, telling us that he was slain by his Sister's Husband: For the plain words of the Scripture, naming the year wherein he gave liberty to Jecoonia, do plainly testify that he out-lived the three or four and fortieth year of his Fathers reign, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to have succeeded Evilmerodach in the Kingdom, might indeed have so done, though not when he held it in his own right. Of Balthazar, who was his Son and Heir, we find, that he had such conditions, as

God

God permitted to be in a King for the ruin of the people. He was from his young years of a mischievous nature; having in his Fathers time slain a Noble young man that should have married his Sister, only for spite and envy to see him kill two wild beasts in hunting, at which himself having thrown his javelin had misfed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beauty, said, It were a happy woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous villanies caused many which had loved his Father (as a good and gracious, though unfortunate Prince) to revolt from him unto the enemy as soon as he was King. Neither do I find that he performed any thing worthy of record, but as a coward and a fool he lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to give battle to them that daily took somewhat from him. Yet he carelessly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on every side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom he had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a fool taken in unexcusable security, yet had not that happiness, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of fear, but wasterfished with a dreadful vision; which had threatened his ruin not in many hours before, even whilst he was drinking in that wine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable reign of seventy years, he perished like a beast, and was slain as he deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath been spoken heretofore; in matter of his affairs, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose story, that of Balthasar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the original and first greatness of the Persians.

§. I.

That the Medes were the chief actors in the subversion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was joyed first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria, and of Media itself.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides himself, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Provincial Governours having cut down the last branch of Ninus in Sardaniapalus, divided between them the Eastern Empire. Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two years after that the Line of Belochus was ended in Balthasar; the Dominions as well of the Conqueror, as of the conquered, fell to a third Family, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achamenes; the Princes of which blood reigning in Persia, had formerly been dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the world.

Of the Family of the Achamenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third Son of Japhet. That they had Kings soon after the Flood, Laëtantius and Diodorus have found record; For Laëtantius remembereth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodore speaketh of Pharnus with his seven Sons, slain by the Assyrians in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians, I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I have spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these:

Arbaces	28 years.
Sorannus	30 years.
Medius	40 years.
Cardaces	13 years.
Dioctes	53 years.
Phraortes	24 years.
Cyaxares	32 years.
Astyages	38 years.
Darius Medus

And

And though the Greeks ascribe the Conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach us, that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Army victorious over Balthasar was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was, during his own life. For we find in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes took the Kingdom being three-score and two years old: And further, what Officers it pleased him to set over the Kingdom. And so was prophesied by Esaï long before: Behold, I will stir up the Medes against them, &c. And by Jeremy; The Lord hath raised up the spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Julius Africanus doth well open, who taking authority from Diodore, Cassor, Thallus, and others, delivereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reign; which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subjugated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Justin and Herodotus are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what means the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

HOW the Kingdom of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians; But rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of those who give the Conquest of Babel to the Persians only. For some there are who deny that Astyages had any other Successor than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way descended from Astyages (whom he called Asligon or Apamia) but only that having vanquished him in battle, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amysis. But I find the relations of Ctesias often cited, and seldom followed, and himself sometimes very justly reproved of wilful untruth.

Vignier, a diligent and learned historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such Son as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirm this opinion the more he citeth Diodore, Justin, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and before them Cassor, Thallus, and Phlegon; who do not find any such Successor. Neither do Tacitus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Julius Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Justin Martyr, Laëtantius, Eusebius, St. Hierom, or St. Augustin, make report out of any faithful Author by them read, that hath given other Son or Successor to Astyages than Cyrus.

Yet (seeing that this manner of argument ab authoritate negativè, doth never enforce consent) we may be the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alleged notwithstanding) to affirm, that either Astyages himself must have been Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; or else to give him some other successor, according to Josephus and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest, and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chief, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest; Cyrus during his life, being no other than the Lieutenant of his Army, and (subject to his authority) the strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassals of Darius, being joyned together to compound it.

But it is very certain, that the honour of that great victory over Babylon was wholly given to Cyrus, who was the instrument pre-ordained and forenamed by God himself for this action, but for the delivery of his Church, a greater work not only in the eyes of God, than the subversion of any State or Monarchy how powerful soever.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers employed in that service did rather ascribe the glory to him that was the best man of war, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling upon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posterity, did much augment the fame of his vertue; which among prophane Historians over-grew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because he was old, and did nothing in person; as also because he soon after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possessor of whatsoever belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conqueror was carried far off.

And for the Greek Historians, they took all things from the relation of the Persians, who gave to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equal. Only Daniel in the first, fifth, and sixth Chapters of his Prophecy, makes it plain, that himself not only lived a great Officer under

King Darius, but that he continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus; which being the year of Daniel's death, could not have been distinguished from the reign of Darius, if they had begun together and reigned jointly: Neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdom by Cyrus's permission, considering that Cyrus began after him.

§. III.

Xenophon's relation of the War with the Medes and Persians, made with joint forces upon the Assyrians and others.

These Testimonies of the Scriptures, which need no other confirmation, are yet made more open to our understanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these Wars: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Assyrian had enlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries; he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought under his subjection, there should not then be left any Nation adjoining, able to make head against him. For, the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threecore thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being joined, made an exceeding strong Army.

The Assyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, invited Cræsus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in men and treasure, and with him other Lords of Asia the less, to his assistance, alladging, that those Eastern Nations were very powerful, and so firmly conjoined by league, and many alliances, that it would not be easy, nor not possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements, and strengthened with great Presents, he drew to himself so many adherents, as he compounded an Army of two hundred thousand foot, and threecore thousand horse; of which, ten thousand horse, and forty thousand foot were led by Cræsus, who had great cause of enmity with the Medes, in regard of the War made by them against his Father Alyattes: But this great Army was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus General of the Persian forces, utterly broken: Upon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slain, so many of the Assyrians revolted, as Babylon it self could not longer be assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great fumes of money out of Asia the less, Egypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his advantage, possessed himself of a great part of the lesser Asias which time it was, as I take it, that Cræsus himself was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soon after, the Army lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon called Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his Sisters Son, prevailed against Balthazar, as in due time shall be set down.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him levied, are numbered thirty thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the common sort were Archers, or such as used the Dart or Sling: So far Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the pattern of a most Heroical Prince, with much Poetical addition: so it cannot be denied, but that the bulk and groer of his Narration was founded upon meer Historical truth.

Neither can it indeed be affirmed of any the like Writers, that in every speech and circumstance he hath precisely tyed himself to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his own invention, appropriating the fame to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Moral and Political discourse, and examining but the History of things done, it will easily appear, that Xenophon hath handled his under-taken subject in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any sort corrupted the body.

§. IV.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times foregoing this great War.

For it is commonly agreed upon, that Achæmenes, the Son of Perseus, being Governor of Persia, did associate himself with Arbaces, who commanded in Media, in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victory obtained, held for himself the Dominion of those Countries, which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conveyed over the fame honour and power to their posterity: which in Media was not absolutely Regal, but with some restraint limited, until such time as Deiaces took upon him the full authority and majesty of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the reign of Deiaces, are usually accounted about an hundred and forty years in the last sixty whereof, there reigned in Assyria mighty Princes, namely, namely, Salmanassar and his Successors; whose great achievements in Syria and elsewhere, witness, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their advantage to undertake any offensive war against those victorious Kings, it being also probable, that the league continued as yet between these the successors of Belochus and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deiaces to the first of Aflyages, there past about ninety years, in which, if Herodotus have written truly, that Phraortes conquered Persia, and how he and other Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their Dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had been but an unadvised enterprize of the Assyrians and Babylonians, to have waited themselves against the Syrians, and Egyptians, leaving so able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing upon the South parts of Persia; and that the Persians themselves were not Masters of Susiana in Nabuchodonosor's time; it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Governor for the Babylonians in Susa, or Susan, the chief City thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either under Cyaxares, or Aflyages, or both, had quarrel with Halyattes the Father of Cræsus, which, after some fix years dispute, was compounded.

How the affairs of Persia stood in so many ages, I do not find any memory. It seemeth that the roughness of the mountainous Country which they then possessed, with the confederacy which they continued with the Medes, gave them more security than fame: For if their Kings, being the posterity of Achæmenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatness which they afterward obtained, would not have suffered any forgetfulness thereof. But as we find all Xenophon's reports, both of these Wars, and the state of those Countries to be very consonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors; so it appears, that the race of Achæmenes held the Principality of Persia from Father to Son for many descents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyses the Father of Cyrus was King of Persia; than to those that make him a mean man, and say, that Aflyages gave him his Daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her Son (whose nativity he feared) might be disabled from any great undertaking by his Fathers ignobility.

For, what cause of grief could it be to Aflyages, that the Son of his Daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asia? No, it was more likely, that upon such a Prophecy his love to his Grand-child should have increased, and his care been the greater to have married her to some Prince of strength and eminent virtue.

Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Author, and, as I think, the deviser of the mischief intended against Cyrus by his Grand-father, doth confess, That the line of the Achæmenides was so renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his prosperity, did thence derive himself, and vaunt of it: which he would never have done, had they been ignoble, or had they been the vassals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this sort Xerxes in the seventh of Herodotus deriveth himself;

Achæmenes.	Teispes.	Hystaspes.
Cambyses.	Ariarannes.	Darius.
Cyrus.	Artabanus.	Xerxes.

Of the Achæmenides there were two races: of the first was Cyrus the great, whose illustrious male failed in his two Sons, Cambyses and Smerdis. This royal family is thus set down by the learned Reineccius.

Achæmenes, the Son of Perseus, first King of Persia.

Darius.

Cyrus, the first of that name, had Cambyses, and Aflyas, who, married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artabazus and other Daughters.

Cambyses had Cyrus the Great: Cyrus had Cambyses, who succeeded him, and Smerdis, slain by his Brother Cambyses.

Of the second, were those seven great Princes of Persia, who having overthrown the usurped Royalty of the Magi, chose from among themselves Darius the Son of Hystaspes, King.

This Kingdom of Persia was first known by the name of Elam, so called after Elam the Son of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamites; by Elianus, Elyms; by Josephus, Elymi.

Suidas derives this Nation sometimes from Assur, sometimes from Magog, of whom they were called Magufai; which Magufai, according to Eusebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in general, but for those that were afterward called the Magi, or Wise-men. So do the Greeks, among many other their sayings of them, affirm, That the Persians were anciently written Artei, and that they called themselves Cephenei. But that

Gen. 10. that they were Elamites, Moses, and the Isa. 11. 21. Prophets, Ezra, Jeremy, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Jer. 25. 29. Ezdras, in many places confirm: Which also Ezek. 34. St. Hierom upon Jeremy the five and twenty Dan. 8. tieth, upon Daniel the eighth, and also in
 Efd. 4. his Hebrew questions, approveth, saying:
 2 Mar. 9. Elam & quo Elamite Principes Perſia; Elam,
 1 Mar. 6. of whom were the Elamites Princes of Perſia.

And that City which the Author of the second Book of the Maccabees calleth Perſepolis, is by the Author of the first called Elamais, but is now called Siras, being the same which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof twice attempted, in vain, and to his great dishonour. And yet this City, now called Siras, was not the old Perſepolis; for Alexander, at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The first King of Perſia to us known, if we follow the current of Authors interpreting the fourteenth Chapter of Geneſis, was Ebedorlagmer, who lived with Abraſel or Ninings, and joyned with him in the war against the Arabians, who was afterward extinguished by the forces of Abraham.

CHAP. III.

Of Cyrus.

§. I.

Of Cyrus his Name, and first actions.

Strab. l. 15. AS touching the Name of Cyrus Strabo faith, That the same was taken from a River which watereth Perſia; this great Prince having Agradatus for his proper Name: But the great Cyrus was the first of that Name. Herodotus, otherwife; and that Cyrus signifieth a Father, in the Perſian-Tongue, and therefore so intitled by the people.

It is true, that for his Justice and other excellent virtues he was indeed called a Father: But that the Name of Cyrus had any such signification, I think it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to say as the Sun, in the same Language. Howsoever it be, yet the Prophet Ezra, almost two hundred years before Cyrus was born, gives him that Name, Thus saith the Lord unto Cyrus his Anointed, &c.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which the Conquest of Lydia, and other Provinces thereto subject, together with the taking of Craesus himself, are not recounted by Enchiridius, Orosius, and others, but placed among his latter achievements: whose opinion for his difference of time is founded upon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in the last war against Craesus; and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; and the glorious victory which Cyrus had over Babylon, to the five and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might have been used (and was by the Greeks) to exclude the Medes from the honour of having won Babylon itself, which in due place I have answered. The latter seems to have reference to the second War which Cyrus made upon Lydia, when it rebelled; as which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations never offered to revolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to believe with Herodotus, whom the most of Chronologers follow, and find the enterprize of Sardis to precede that of Babylon.

§. II.

Of Craesus the King of Lydia, who made war upon Cyrus.

I Have in the last Book spoke somewhat of Craesus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which governed Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors known) was Lydius the Son of Arys: which Family extinguished, the Kingdom was by an Oracle conferred upon Argon, descended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twenty Generations; Candaules being the last; who by shewing his fair wife naked to Eger his favourite, he was by the same Eger (thereto urged urged upon peril of his own life by the Queen) the next day slain. Which done, Eger enjoyed both the Queen and the Kingdom of Lydia, and left the same to Arys his Son, who was Father to Sadyattes, the Father of Halyattes (who thrust the Cimmerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Craesus. Which five Kings, of a third race, enjoyed that Kingdom an hundred and seventy years. Halyattes the Father of Craesus was an undertaking Prince, and after he had continued a War against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it six years, a peace was concluded upon equal conditions between them.

Afflyges the Son of Cyaxares, and Grandfather to Cyrus, thought himself greatly honoured by obtaining Argenes, Craesus Sister, whom he married.

But Craesus so far enlarged his Dominions after his Fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territory to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were four in effect of equal strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, and the Lydian: only Nabuchodonosor, after he had joyned Phenicia, Palestina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no Competitor during his own life.

But Craesus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrel of the Babylonians, he yet mastered Eolis, Doris, and Ionis, Provinces posselt by the Greeks in Asia the less, adjoining to Lydia; gave Law to the Phrygians, Bithinians, Carians, Mysians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforced the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their City with Diana's Girdle, Herodotus witnesseth. Moreover, Alcibiades out of Ereque (which also confirmeth) makes report of a Signal Victory, which Craesus obtained against the Sacians, a Nation of the Scythians, in memory whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearly celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacaea: All which he performed in fourteen years.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and envious of Cyrus fame, doubting also that his prosperous undertakings might in the end grow perilous to himself, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo (whom he presented with marvellous rich gifts) what success he might hope for against Cyrus, if he undertook him: from whom he received this riddle; Craesus passing over the River Halys, shall dissolve a great Dominion. For the Devil being doubtful of the success, payed him with merchandize of both side alike, and might be inverted either way; to the ruin of Perſia, or of his own Lydia.

§. III.

Craesus his Expedition against Cyrus.

HEREUPON Craesus being resolved to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, despised all the arguments used by Sandanes to the contrary, who desired him to fore-think, That he urged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region; a people not covered with the soft ilk of Worms, but with the hard skins of Beasts; not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of Water, not of Wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; over whom, if he became victorious, he could thereby enrich himself in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, and subjected, so great would his loss appear of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceived.

Notwithstanding this solid counsel, Craesus having prepared a powerful Army, he led the same toward Media, but in his passage he was arrested at Eternium, a City of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he sought by all means to surprize or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I do not find: for, out of doubt, Craesus, as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and ability; so was he not under any in territory and fame that then lived.

But, as Craetippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they favoured a disturber and usurper of the Common-weal against him who fought for the Roman liberty, That Kingdoms and Common-weals had their increase and period from divine Ordinance: so, at this time was the Winter of Craesus prosperity at hand, the leaves of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had given a date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of divers skirmishes, the Perſians and Lydians began to joyn in gro's troops: supplies from both Kings thrust on upon the falling off, and advancement of either Nations: and as the Perfians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the dark vail of night had hidden each Army from the others view, Cræfus doubting what success the rising Sun would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speed possible retired, and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first City and Regal Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arrived, and nothing suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other War for that Winter, he dismissed the Souldiers, and sent the troops of his sundry Nations to their own Provinces, appointing them to re-assemble at the end of five months, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the War at the time appointed.

§. IV.

The Conquest of Lydia by Cyrus.

Cyrus in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his Army in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily and at their heels, as to be discovered. But having good intelligence of Cræfus his proceeding, he so measured his marches, as he presented not himself before Sardis, till such time as Cræfus had disposed his Army to their wintring garriſons; which being altogether unlooked for, and unfear'd, he surrounded Sardis with his Army; Wherein Cræfus having no other Companies than his Citizens and Ordinary Guards, after fourteen days siege the same was entred by assault, and all executed that resisted. Cræfus having now neither Arms to fight, nor wings to fly, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompass'd, thrust himself into the heap and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had undergone the common fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a son of his, who had been dumb all his life (by extremity of passion and fear enabled) cry'd out to the Souldiers to spare Cræfus. Who thereupon being taken and imprison'd, deſpoiled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and set on the top of a great and high heap of wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembering the discourse which he had with the Athenian Law-giver, he thrice cry'd out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that invocation, he first used silence; but urg'd again, he told them, That he had now found it true which Solon had long since told him, That many men in the race and courses of their lives might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could discern himself for happy indeed, till his end.

Of which answer Cyrus being speedily informed, remembering the changes of fortune, and his own morality, he commanded his Ministers of Justice to withdraw the fire, with all diligence, to save Cræfus, and to conduct him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him? or what self-reason had conducted him to invade his territory, and to make him of a Friend an Enemy? To whom he thus answered; It was thy prosperous, and my unprosperous destiny (the Grecian god flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inventors and conductors of Cræfus War against Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierc'd with Cræfus answer, and bewailing his estate, though victorious over it, did not only spare his life, but entertained him ever after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Bene non caſam, sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the real difference discern'd between that behaviour which we call beneficium latronis, and gratiam Principis: A thief sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but unjustly: A King that giveth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his own evil.

The report made by Xenophon, is, That Cyrus did friendly entertain Cræfus at the first fight, not mentioning that which Herodotus delivers, and is here already set down, that he should have been burnt alive. It may very well be, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroicall Prince, thought an intent so cruel, fitter to be forgotten than rehearsed, as too much misbecoming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that nearness of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had he been otherwise vicious) from so cruel a purpose against his Grandmothers brother. Howsoever it was, the moral part of the Story hath given much credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it pass for current, though the trust repos'd in Cræfus afterwards may seem to argue, that Cyrus did not use him inhumanly at the first.

For, as Herodotus himself telleth us, when Cyrus pass'd with his Army over Araxes into Scythia, he left Cræfus to accompany and advise his son Cambyses, Governour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he liv'd all the time of Cyrus, and did afterward follow low Cambyses into Egypt, where he hardly escap'd his tyrannous hand. What his end was, I do not find.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the World took end; so to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydians; in Balthazar, Cyaxares, and Cræfus.

§. V.

How Cyrus won Babylon.

After this Lydian War, ensued the great Conquest of Babylon, which gave unto Cyrus an Empire so large and mighty, that he was justly reputed the greatest Monarch then living upon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action took up, it is uncertain; only it seems, that ten whole years did pass between his taking those two Cities of Sardis and Babylon; which nevertheless I do not think to have been wholly occupied in provision for the Assyrian war, but rather to have been spent in settling the Estate which he had already purchased. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments, of a war made by Cyrus upon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the victory obtained against Cræfus. He telleth us, That Cyrus invaded Scythia, and being victorious over that Nation, took Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battel overthrown by the wife of Amorges, Sparteha, and therein taken, the one King was delivered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought that no small part of those troubles which arose in the lower Asia, grew soon after the departure of the victorious Army, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the less, many Nations, conquered formerly by Cræfus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; against whom he employed Pactias, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phocians under their former obedience, and then the rest of the Greeks inhabiting Asia the less, as the Ionians, Carians, Æolians, and Lycians, who resolvedly (according to the strength they had) defended themselves. But in the attempt upon Babylon itself, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, having taken order before-hand, that nothing should be able to divert him, or to raise that siege, and make frustrate the work upon which he did set all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care and strength unto the taking of that City, which befide the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was so strongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, and surrounded with waters unfordable, so plentifully victualled for many years, that the inhabitants were not only free from all doubt and fear of their estate, but despised and derided all purposes and power of their besiegers.

The only hope of the Medes and Perfians, who despair'd of carrying by assault a City so well fortified and man'd, was, in cutting off all supplies of victuals and other necessities: whereof though the Town was said to be stored sufficiently for more than twenty years, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of people as dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would soon appear, and vanquish the resolution of that unwarlike multitude. In expecting the success of this course, the Besiegers were likely to endure much travel, and all in vain, if they did not keep straight watch and strong guards upon all quarters.

This was hard to do, in regard of the vast circuit of those walls which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently allured unto their Commander: The consideration whereof ministr'd unto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Scythians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Town to keep them in, who having been their ancient friends and allies, were more likely to joyn with them, if occasion were offered than to use much diligence on the behalf of Cyrus; who had, as it were yesterday, laid upon their necks the galling yoke of servitude. Whilst the besieged were pleasing themselves in this deceitful and vain gladness, that is the ordinary fore-runner or sudden calamity; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inventive, devised, by so many channels and trenches, as were sufficient and capable of Emperors, to draw the same from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and assured: which when by the labour of many hands he had performed, he stayed the time of his advantage for the execution: for he had left certain banks or heads un-cut, between the main river which surrounded the City, and his own Trenches.

Now Balthazar, finding neither any want or weakness within, nor any possibility of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding sumptuous Feast, to publick

Playes, and other Pastimes; and thereto invited a thousand of his Princes or Nobility, besides his Wives, Curtizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the bescigners know, that his provisions were either sufficient, not only for all needfull uses, but even for jollity and excess; or because he hoped that his enemies, under the burthen of many distresses, were well near broken in honour of Bell his most revered Idol; or that it was his Birth or Coronation-day; or for many or all these respects. And he was not contented with such magnificence as no Prince else could equal, but (using Daniel's words) he lifted himself up against the Lord of Heaven: for he and his Princes, Wives and Concubines, made earowing cups of the vessels of Gold, in contempt of whom, he praised his own Puppets, made of Silver and Gold, of Brass, Iron, Wood, and Stone: Quanti sunt sustinuit in vasis aureis biberet, lignos et lapideos deos laudare? How great a jolliness was it (saith S. Hierom) drinking in golden cups, to praise gods of Wood and Stone. While Balthazar was in this fort triumphing, and his brains well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by divine power wrote on the wall opposite unto him, certain words which he understood not: wherewith fo great a fear and amazement seized him, as the joys of his loyns were loosd, and his knees more one against the other. Which passion, when he had in some part recovered, he cried out for his Chaldeans, Astrologians, and Southsayers, promising them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdom to him that could read and expound the writing: but it exceeded their Art. In this disturbance and astonishment, the Queen hearing what had past, and of the Kings amazement, after reverence done, used this speech: There is a man in thy Kingdom, in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy Father, light, and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonosor, thy Father, the King (I say) thy Father made chief of the Inchanters, Astrologians, Chaldeans, and Southsayers, because a more excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, &c. were found in him, even in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

This Queen Josephus takes for the Grandmother; Origen and Theodoret, for the Mother of Balthazar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that she was not any of the Kings Wives, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dancing and banqueting, she came in upon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his distraction. And whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger years and times, this old Queen remembered well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchodonosor, Grandfather to this Balthazar, and kept in mind both his Religion and divine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promises of reward and honour, to read and interpret those words miraculously written; to whom Daniel made answer in a far different style from that he used towards his Grandfather: for, the evil which he foretold Nabuchodonosor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies; but to this King (whose neglect of God, and vice, he hated) he answered in these words, Keep thy rewards to thy self, and give thy gifts to another: yet will I read the writing unto the King, and shew him the interpretation. Which, before he had performed, he gave him first the cause of Gods just judgement against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence, whereof the King and all his Wife men were utterly ignorant. Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodness to his Father, whom all Nations: cared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefits, as he deprived him of his estate and understanding, so upon the acknowledgment of Gods infinite power he restored him to both. This King, notwithstanding, lifted himself up against the same God; and presuming both to abuse those Vessels dedicated to holy uses, and neglected the Lord of all power, praised and worshipped the dead Idols of Gold, Silver, Brass, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those words, from the Oracle of a true God delivered, (to wit) Mene, Tekel, Upharsin, gave the King knowledge, that God hath numbered the time of his Kingdom, and finished it; That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods Justice, and found too light; and that his Empire was divided and given to the Medes and Persians.

The very evening or night of this day, wherein Balthazar feasted and perished, Cyrus, either by his espials, according to Xenophon; or inspired by God himself, whose design he followed in this War, found the time and opportunity to invite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobility were no less filled with the vapors of Wine, than their hearts with the fear of Gods judgment, he caused all the banks and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut down with that diligence, as by them he drew the great River of Euphrates dry for the present, by whose channel running, his Army made their entrance, finding none to disturb them. All the Town lay buried (as the Poet saith) in sleep and wine: such as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, unless they saved themselves by flight, as some did, who ran away crying, and filling the streets with an uncertain tumult.

Such Assyrian Lords as had revolted from Balthazar, and betaken themselves to the party of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected company to the Kings Palaces, which having easily forced, they rushed into the Chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, slew both him and them without any mercy, who struggled in vain to keep those lives which God had newly threatened to take away. And now was the Prophecy of Jeremy fulfilled, and that of Ezay two hundred years before this subversion, who in his seven and fortieth Chapter, and elsewhere, writeth this destruction fo feelingly and lively, as if he had been present both at the terrible slaughter there committed, and had seen the great and unfeared change and calamity of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrows and bewailings of every surviving soul thereunto subject. His Prophecy of this place he beginneth in these words: Come down, and sit in the dust, O Virgin Daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And again, Sit still, and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldeans; for thou shalt no more be called the Lady of Kingdoms. For, though it cannot be doubted, that God used Nabuchodonosor, and the Chaldeans, to punish the Idolatry of the Judeans; yet Ezay teacheth us in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his judgments was mixt with a rigorous extremity. For (saith Ezay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I have polluted mine inheritance, and given them into thine hand: thou didst see them no mercy, but thou didst lay thy very heavy yoke upon the ancient. I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and will cut off from Babel the Name, and the Remnant, and the Son, and the Nephew. And in the thirteenth, Every one that is found, shall be stricken thorow: whosoever joyneth himself, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their eyes, their houses spoiled, and their Wives ravished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victory of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leave the same to posterity after it happened, than Ezay hath done in many places of his Prophecies, which were written two hundred years before any thing attempted.

The greatness and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by divers grave Authors (set down, might seem altogether fabulous: for, besides the reports of Saint Hierom, Solinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politicks, the second Chapter, received the report for true, That one part of the City knew not that the rest was taken three dayes alter. Which is not impossible, if the testimony of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who findes the compass thereof at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and forty miles: the walls whereof had fo great a breadth, that six Chariots might pass in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesius and Clitarchus, three hundred threescore and five foot, garnished with an hundred and fifty Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Book of Geography, gives it a greater circuit, adding five and twenty Furlongs more to the former compass, reckoning the same at three hundred fourscore and five Furlongs, which make eight and forty mile and one Furlong, but finds the wall far under that which Diodore reports: and fo doth Curtius measure their thickness but at two and thirty foot, and their height at an hundred cubits, which is also very much; every cubit containing a foot and a half of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the City he gives the same with Siculus, and eight Furlongs more. Herodotus finds a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, four hundred and fourscore furlongs circles; the thickness of the wall he measures at fifty cubits, and the height at two hundred of the same regal cubit. For entrance, it had an hundred Gates of Brass, with posts and Hooks to hang them on of the same metal: and therefore did the Prophet Ezay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princes and Glory of Kingdoms.

But when Cyrus had won her, he stript her out of her Princely Robes, and made her a slave; dividing not only all her goodly houses, and her whole Territory, with all the riches therein contained, among his Souldiers; but bestowing the inhabitants themselves as bond-slaves upon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the reign of Cyrus, and the time which he enjoyed in rest and pleasure; I can say no more of it, than that it is generally rally agreed by all Chronologers to have lasted only seven years : in which time he made such Constitutions as differ little from the Ordinances of all wise Kings that are desirous to establish a Royal power to themselves and their posterity.

§. VI.

The End of Cyrus.

THE last War, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written. Herodotus and Justin deliver, That after the Conquest of Asia the less, Cyrus invaded the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, governed by Tomyris their Queen : and that in an encounter between the Perrians and these Northern Nomades, Tomyris lost her Army, and her Son Spargapises that commanded it : In revenge whereof, this Queen making new levies of men of War, and following the War against Cyrus, in a second battle beat the Persian Army, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his body, and cast the same into a bowl of blood, using these words ; Thou that hast all thy life time thirsted for blood, now drink thy fill, and satiate thyself.

It should hereby seem, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was persuaded to abate their fury by some forcible invasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyaxares Father to Astyages, those Scythians invaded Media and Asia the less, and held the same in a servile subjection eight and twenty years.

This War, which Metasthenes calleth Tomyricus, lasted (saith he) six years, and took end at the end of Cyrus.

But in this particular I believe with Viginius, that this Scythian War was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the conquest of Lydia, according to Ctesias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparethia, though he deliver the success of that War otherwise than Herodotus doth : Therather (saith Viginius) because Strabo in his eleventh Book reciteth, that Cyrus surprized the Sacians by the same stratagem by which Justin saith, he defeated the Son of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last War which Cyrus made, was against Amorbæus King of the Derbicians, a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia; whom though he overcame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he suffered three days after.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his own City of Pasagardes, which himself had built, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time ; which is said to have been this : O vir, quicumque es, & undecunque advenis, neque enim te adventurum ignoravi : Ego sum Cyrus qui Persi imperium constitui, pusillum hoc terra quo meum tegitur corpus mihi ne invidas ; O thou man, whatsoever thou art, or whencesoever thou comest ; for I was not ignorant that thou shouldst come : I am Cyrus that founded the Persian Empire, do not envy unto me this little earth, with which my body is covered.

This Tomb was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either upon hope of treasure, supposed to have been buried with him (or upon desire to honour his dead body with certain ceremonies) in which there was found an old rotten Target, two Scythian Bows, and a sword. The Coffin wherein in his body lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his own garment, and a Crown of Gold to be set upon it. These things well considered, as they give credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his body in the hands of Tomyris.

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Army of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his Son would so soon have transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, so far off from that quarter ; the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media : neither had Cambyses been able in such haste to have undertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather believe Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged, and in peace : and that finding in himself, that he could not long enjoy the world, he called unto him his Nobility, with his two Sons, Cambyses and Smerdis ; or, after Xenophon, Tanooxares : and, after a long Oration, wherein he allured himself, and taught others, of the immortality of the Soul, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deserving of every man in this life ; he exhorted his Sons by the strongest arguments he had, to a perpetual concord and agreement. Many other things he uttered, which make it probable, that he received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he governed Susa in Persia ; and that Cyrus himself had read the Prophecy of Isay, wherein he was expressly named, and by God (for the delivery of his people) preordained. Which act of delivering the Jews from their Captivity, and of restoring the holy Temple and City of Jerusalem, was in true consideration the noblest work that ever Cyrus performed. For in other other actions he was an instrument of Gods power, used for the chafing of many Nations, and the establishing of a Government in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the Grace to be an instrument of Gods goodness, and a willing advancer of his Kingdom upon Earth ; which must last for ever, though heaven and earth shall perish.

Of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Jerusalem.

HAVING therefore spoken of his great Victories, mentioned by sundry Historians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his service done unto him that was Author of them and of all goodness : I hold it meet at length to speak of the Decree made in the first of his Reign, being perhaps the first that ever he made after his possession of the Babylonian Empire : That the captive Jews should return again into their own Territory, and re-build the House of God in Jerusalem, having now endured and finished the threescore and ten years captivity, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, he gave order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessary and wanting. He also restored unto them five thousand four hundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Silver, whereof Nabucodonosor, the Grandfather of Balthazar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Jews which returned out of Chaldea under their Leader Zorobabel, the Son of Salathiel, and Nephew to King Jeconias, and Jesai or Josias the son of Josadak, were about fifty thousand ; where, as soon as they arrived, they built an Altar to the living God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their own Law, and afterward bethought themselves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

But no sooner did the Jews begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritans and other Idolatrous Nations adjoining, gave all the impediment they could. So did the Governments of those Provinces under Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort favoured the Jews, nor the labours nor purposes they had in hand. And not only those which were but Provincial Lieutenants, and other officers of less place, but Cambyses himself ; who having the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was builded otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatsoever Cambyses did when himself had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition : they may herein resolve themselves out of Esdra's. That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therefore it is true, what the Jews themselves affirm, as it is written in the second of John, That the Temple was 46. years in sitting up, having received so many hindrances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if we seek the natural and politick courses which moved Cambyses to withstand his Fathers Decree, as well while he Governed under him, as when himself became sole and Sovereign Monarch, we shall finde them in that Epistle remembered by Esdra's, written by Belemus, Attribudates, and the rest, Presidents and Counsellors in Phenicia, wherein they complain that the Jews were evermore rebellious and troublers of Kings ; that their City being once builded, they would then refuse to pay tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment, was, that Cambyses having in his resolution to invade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion ; That the Jews were descended of those Nations, because they issued thence under Moses, when they conquered Judea ; their City being once repaired and fortified, they might return to their old vomit, and give the same disturbance to Cambyses Conquest, which they did to Sennacherib, Nabucodonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For, as it is written in Ezekiel, Egypt was the confidence of the house of Israel.

But it is to be understood, as Codomain and others have observed, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counsellors and Governors of Phenicia complained against the Jews, did not precede, but succeed Darius Hystaspes, as in the sixth and seventh Chapters of Esdra's it is made plain : and also that those Governors (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and enclosing of the City, as by the reasons given in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is evident.

Also in the sixth of Ezra, the fourteenth verse, the Kings are named in order as they Governed, and Artaxerxes written after Darius ; as : And they built and finished it (to wit the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Israel, and by the commandement of Cyrus and and Darius, and Artabasthe Kings of Persia. Lastly, in the seventh of Ezra it is written; Now after these things, in the reign of Artabasthe King of Persia: which was as much as to say, after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Ezdras is there named by anticipation, not in his own time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the City and Temple of Hierusalem. Which action though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other Ordinances of Cyrus, with his form and manner of Government, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire unto his eldest Son Cambyses, appointing Smerdis or Tanaxares his younger son to be Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadusica; and then died, after he had reigned (saith Herodotus) one and thirty years, or (according to Justin) but thirty.

§. VIII.

Of Cyrus his Issue: and whether Atossa were his Daughter, or (as some think) were the same with Queen Hecster.

Cyrus had issue two sons, Cambyses and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Artystona: Ctesias addeth to these, Amytis. Atossa and Meroe their brother Cambyses married; Artystona, Darius Hytaspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyses being dead: who (as some Writers have supposed) inflamed both her husbands, Darius, and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to be avenged of the whole Nation for the cruel intent that Aman (whom the old Translation calleth a Macedonian) had against the Jews, though the opinion of Josephus was more probable, who finds Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be understood, how Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, should have been Eftber, whose History seems rather to appertain to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the son of Hytaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to have Greece brought under the yoke of Persia, was partly grounded upon the honour which thereby the thought her husband might obtain, partly upon a feminine humour of getting many brave Dames, Corinthians; Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot give assent to the opinion of Codemus, who upon the near sound of the two names, Atossa and Hadassa, (by the latter of which Eftber was also called) makes them to have been one person. For though it be true that Eftber concerning her parentage, a while might be taken for a great Lady; yet Codemus's inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare unto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certain it is, that Eftber did at length discover her kindred and Nation; whereby, if Histories could be kept free from this error, yet the people, and especially the Nobility, must needs have understood the truth: who nevertheless did so well know the parentage of Atossa, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her son Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdom before his elder brother, against whom also he could have pretended a very weak claim. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. IV.

The Estate of things from the Death of Cyrus to the Reign of Darius.

§. I.

Of the Number and Names of the Persian Kings.

OF the Successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metaphanes, who hath numbered the Persian Kings, and their times as followeth.

Darius Medus , and Cyrus jointly.	2
Cyrus alone.	20
Prifcus Artaxerxes .	22
Darius Longimanus .	37
Darius Notus .	19
Artaxerxes Mnemon .	55

Artax-

Artaxerxes Ochus .	26
Arjes , or Arjames .	4
Darius , the last, conquered by Alexander .	6 years.

To which Philo agreeth; which number of years added, make in all an hundred ninety and one. But in this Catalogue Metaphanes hath left out Cambyses and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Assuerus, for the immediate successor of Cyrus; in place (saith Melancthon) of Darius the Son of Hytaspes: for Metaphanes, as Melancthon conjectureth, doth not account Cambyses in the Catalogue, because his reign was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a second Opinion, though ridiculous, of Sedar Olam, who finds but four Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus, have also a differing account from the Greeks; whom nevertheless Engelbium, and most of the Latins follow, and so doth Krentzheim, who hath fully answered; and, as I take it, refused all the former Authors varying from that account. For in this sort do the Greeks marshal the Persian Kings with the times of their reigns.

Cyrus in all.	307
Cambyses with the Magi .	8
Darius Hytaspes .	36
Xerxes .	21
Artaxerxes Longimanus .	40
Darius Notus .	19
Artaxerxes Mnemon .	43
Artaxerxes Ochus .	23
Arjames .	2
Darius the last.	6

Which numbers put together, make in all two hundred and thirty.

This account (as I have said) the most Chronologers, and the best learned approve. These Persian Princes, being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Pencer in his historical Animadversions, hath gathered the places; finding first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, ch. 36. vers. 22, 23. Ezra 1. ch. 1. vers. 1. and often elsewhere.

Secondly, Cambyses in the eleventh of Daniel, who may indeed be well esteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the Marginal Commentator upon the Geneva understands that place; but, under correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he saith in the same note, that Darius Hytaspes was an enemy to the people of God, and stood against them: his great favour and liberality to the Jews being elsewhere proved.

Thirdly, Is Darius Hytaspes found in Ezra the first, c. 4. v. 5. whom in the sixth verse is also named Athasserus.

Fourthly, In the eleventh of Daniel, verse the second, Xerxes is plainly foretold and described; and the great War which he should make against the Greeks by Daniel remembered.

Fifthly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verse eleven, who is also called Artabastha, c. 4. l. 1. Ezra v. 7. and chap. 7. v. 7.

Sixthly, Darius Notus, Ezra cap. 4. v. 24. and cap. 5. v. 6. Nehem. cap. 12. v. 22.

Seventhly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem. cap. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arjames: for Darius the last, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the son of Atossa, Cyrus his Daughters; and the issue male of Cyrus failing with his own Sons.

But to proceed, Engelbium, with the Latins following the Greeks, apply the beginnings and ends of every Persian King with their Acts, to some certain Olympiads; As the War of Alyages (Cyrus his maternal Grandfather) and Alyattes (Cresus his Father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reign, to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiads. The invasion of Egypt by Cambyses to the third year of the threecore, and third Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement between several forms of computation, add the more credit unto both.

Again, this historical demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomical computation of Ptolemy, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of November, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the four hundred and four and twentieth year after Nabonassar. And the Era of Nabonassar began on the six and twentieth of February: which, conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth month of the first year of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accounts of the Olympiads, as do the Greek Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolemy, we shall find every memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

For Ptolemy reckons the time answerable to two hundred and four and twenty Jahals years, and an hundred and forty daies from Nabonassar to the sixteenth of July, in the seventh

seventh year of Cambyſes.

The Greeks, and namely, Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyſes in the ſecond or third year of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyſes ſeventh year, in the fiſt of the threeſcore and fourth Olympiad: which fiſt of the threeſcore and fourth Olympiad runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonaſſar. The like agreement is conſequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewiſe the twentieth of Darius, who ſucceeded Cambyſes, is according to Ptolemy the two hundred and ſix and fortieth of Nabonaſſar, which (obſerving the differences of Nabonaſſar's Ara and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twenty years) agrees with the third of the threeſcore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greeks. In this Joſephus agrees with the Greeks throughout, ſaying that he joyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus in the deſtruction of Babylon; which is true, and not contrary to the Greek computation, but may very well ſtand with it.

Laſtly, The diſagreement and conſuſed accounts of thoſe that follow the other Catalogue of the Perſian Kings formerly rehearſed, doth give the greater credit to this of the Greeks, which being conſtant in itſelf, accordeth alſo with the computation of other Hiſtorians, and Aſtronomers, and likewiſe with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of Cambyſes, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

WE will therefore, according to the truth, give the Empire of Perſia to Cambyſes, the Son of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, ſaving the deſire to increaſe the greatneſs of his Empire: whereof he was poſſeſt in his Fathers time, while Cyrus made war in the North. Cteſias with others give him a longer reign than agreeeth with the Græcian account before received.

In the fiſth year of his ſolereign, and in the third year of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, according to Diodore and Enſebius, he invaded Egypt, and having overthrowen the King thereof, Iſammeniticus, he not only cauſed him to be ſlain, but alſo did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the moſt of his children.

Herodotus and Cteſias give for cauſe of this War (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyſes) that when heſent to Amſis King of Egypt, to have his Daughter in marriage, Amſis preſented him with Nitris the Daughter of Apries his predecessor, which Cambyſes diſdained.

Howſoever it were; true it is, that Cambyſes gathered an Army fit for ſuch an enterprize, and cauſed the ſame to march. But before they entred Egypt, Amſis died, and left Iſammeniticus, whom Cteſias called Amryteus, his ſucceſſor, who enjoyed Egypt after his Father (according to the beſt Copies of Herodotus) but ſix months, though other Chronologers give him fix years.

But how long ſoever he held the Crown, in one battle he loſt it, and was himſelf taken priſoner.

It is ſaid that Cambyſes, following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only ſpare life to the conquered King, but that he alſo truſted him to the Government of Egypt, and that, upon ſome revolt, or ſuſpicion thereof, he cauſed him to be ſlaughtered. But the race of this King was not to be extirpated, if we may believe Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Son called Inarus, who cauſed the Egyptians to revolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Iſammeniticus was at the fiſt entertained gently by Cambyſes, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is alſo written of him, That he ſo much hated Amſis the King of Egypt, who died before his arrival, that he cauſed his body to be drawn out of the grave, and after divers indignities uſed, commanded the ſame to be burnt, contrary to the cuſtom both of the Egyptians and Perſians. For the Egyptians uſed to powder their dead bodies with ſalt, and other drugs, to the end the worms might not devour them. The * Perſians durſt not conſume them with fire, which they eſteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feed it with Carrion.

Neither did the Romans ever conſume their dead to aſhes, till the time of Sylla Dictator, who cauſed his own to be devoured by that element, fearing the Law called Talioſis, or like for like, becauſe himſelf had overthrowen the Carcels of Caius Marius after his death. Herodotus l. 2. c. 54. Strabo l. 1. p. 67. 88. Herodotus l. 3. Sec. 1. 7.

§. III.

The reſt of Cambyſes his Acts.

AFTER this victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyſes ſent an Army into Cyprus, and conſtrained Eucelthon King thereof to acknowledge him who before held that Iſland of the Egyptians.

While Cambyſes yet buſied himſelf in Egypt, he ſo much deteſted the Idolatry of that that Nation, as he cauſed the Images themſelves, with the Temples wherein they were worſhipped, to be torn down and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Army into Lybia, to overturn the Temple of Jupiter Ammon; but the Devil, in defence of his Oratory, raiſed ſuch a Tempeſt of Sand, wherewith the greateſt part of the Country is covered, as the Perſians were therewith choaked and over-wheľmed.

Notwithſtanding which miſadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that, diſdaining to be reſiſted, he prepared the reſt of his Army, which himſelf meant to conďuct into thoſe parts, but that finding a beginning of thoſe incommodities, which his fiſt-ſent troops had tried, he changed his purpoſe. For though conquering Kings have power over men, yet the Elements do not obey them; according to that old Engliſh Proverb, Go, ſaith the King; Stay, ſaith the Tide.

After his return from the attempt of Ethiopia, he cauſed Apis the Egyptian Bull, worſhipped by that Nation as God, to be ſlain: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeal, and been executed as in ſervice of him that only is, and liveth. But ſoon afterwards, when in a dream it ſeemed unto him that Smerdis did ſit in the Royal Throne of Perſia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gave it in charge to his favourite Praxaſpes, to murder Smerdis his Brother. And having married his own Siſters, contrary to the Perſian Laws, he committed a moſt cauſeleſs and moſt deteſtable murder upon the one of them called Meroe, then by himſelf with child, becauſe ſhe bewailed the death of her Brother Smerdis. I find it written of this Cambyſes. That becauſe his Predeceſſors obſerved religiously the Ordinances of their Empire, he aſſembled his Judges and enquired of them, whether there were any Law among the Perſians that did permit the Brother to marry his own Siſter; it being his own intent to do ſo: The Judges (who had always either Laws or diſtinctions in ſtore to ſatiſſie Kings and times) made answer, That there was not any thing written allowing any ſuch conjunction, but they notwithſtanding found it in their cuſtoms, that it was always left to the will of the Perſian Kings, to do what beſt pleaſed themſelves; and ſo, as Naucleus termſ it, invenerunt occaſionem: that is as much to ſay, The Judges found a ſhift to pleaſe the King, and to ſecure themſelves. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings private ſatiſfaction, he cauſed Stammus, one of his Judges, and perchance one of thoſe which favoured his inceſtuouſ match, to be ſlayed alive, for an unjuſt judgement given, and the ſame he hide to be hung up over the judgement-ſeat. After which, beſtowing the Fathers Office on his Son, he willed him to remember that the ſame partiality deſerved the ſame puniſhment.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exerciſed againſt the Son of his beloved Praxaſpes, was very ſtrange and ungrateful. For when he deſired to be truly informed by him what the Perſians thought of his conditions, Praxaſpes answered, That his virtues were followed with abundant praiſe from all men; ſo only it was by many obſerved, that he took more than uſual delight in the taſt of Wine: with which taxation inflamed, he uſed this replication: And, Are the Perſians double-tongued, who alſo tell me, that I have in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? Thou Praxaſpes ſhalt then witneſs, whether in this report they have done me right: for, if at the fiſt thou I pierce thy Sons heart with an Arrow, then is it falſe that hath been ſpoken; but if I miſs the mark, I am then pleaſed that the ſame be accounted true, and my ſubjects believed. This being ſpoken, he immediately directed an Arrow towards the innocent child, who falling down dead with the ſtroak, Cambyſes commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broached on the Arrow, this monſtrous Tyrant greatly rejoicing, ſhewed it to the Father, with this ſaying inſtead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaſpes, thou mayeſt reſolve thy ſelf, that I have not loſt my wits with Wine, but the Perſians theirs, who make ſuch report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exerciſed, till at the laſt, according to the phraſe of our Law, he became ſelon de ſoy. For when he was informed, that Patizaites, and Smerdis the Magi (Cedronus writeth them ſphen-dants and Cimerdus) Miniſters of his do-mineſtical affairs, taking advantage of the great reſemblance between Smerdis the Kings Brother, and Smerdis the Magus, poſſeſt themſelves of the Empire, he made all haſte towards Perſia, and in mounting haſtily on horſe-back, his ſword diſſheathing, pierced his own thigh, wherewith deadly wounded, falling into an over-late and remedileſs repentance of the ſlaughter which he had executed upon his own Brother, he ſoon after gave up his wicked goſt, when he had reigned eight years, accounting therein thoſe ſeven months in which the Magi governed, while he was abſent.

In Cambyſes the Male-Line of Cyrus failed. For he had no iſſue either by Atoſſa or Meroe:

Meropis: yet Zonaras out of Hierom gives him a Daughter called Pantaptes, and a Son called Orontes: who being drowned in the River Ophites by Antioch, the same was afterward, in memory of the Princes death, called Orontes.

He built the City of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Lutopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Island of Nilus, calling it by the name of his Sister Meroe.

§. IV.

of the Inter-regnum between Cambyfes and Darius.

Crus and his two Sons being now dead, and the Kingdom in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfeit of Sauerdia, the Prince, or Satrapa, or Provincial Governors of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrian, Meagabyssus, Aspathines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achamenes the first Persian King) having discovered the fraud of this imposture, joyned their forces together, surprized and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions and Assistants. In which action (saith Jysim) Intaphernes and Aspathines were slain: but Herodotus otherwise, that they were only wounded; for he avoweth, that all the seven Princes were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Governour, these Princes grew into a consultation how the same might be ordered from thenceforth. Othanes (one of the Seven) did not fancy any election of Kings, but that the Nobility and Cities should confederate, and by just Laws defend their Libertie in equality, giving divers reasons for his Opinion, being, as it seemed, greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyses: As first, that it was not safe to give all power to any one, seeing greatness itself, even in good men, doth often infect the mind with many vices, and that liberty and freedom in all things is most apt to insult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Again, that Tyrants do commonly use the service of wicked men, and favour them most; they usurp upon the Laws of their Country; take other mens wives by force, and destroy whom they please without judgement.

Megalyfus was of another Opinion, affirming that the tyranny of a multitude was thrice more intolerable than that of One. For the multitude do all things without judgement, run into businels and affairs with precipitation, like raging and over-bearing floods.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most vertuous; because it is ever found, that excellent Counsels are ever had from excellent men.

Darius gave the third judgement, who pervaded the creation of a King, because even among few diuturnity of concord is seldom found, and in great Empires it doth ever happen that the discord of many Rulers hath enforce'd the election of One Supreme. It were therefore, faith Darius, far safer to observe the Laws of our Country, by which Kingly Government hath been ordained.

The other four Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperial Government, by God established and made prosperous. And, to avoid partiality it was accorded, that the morning following these seven Princes should mount on Horse-back, and on him the Kingdom should be conferred, whose Horse, after the Sun-rising, should first ney or bite. In the evening, after this appointment was made, it is said, that Darius consulted with the Master of his Horse Oebaze, who, in the Suburbs of the City, where the election was resolved of, caused the same Horse, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to cover a Mare, who, as soon as he came into the same place, was the first Horse that brayed. Whereupon the other six princes defended from their Horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato in the third of his Laws affirmeth, that in memory of the seven Princes, whereof Darius himself was one, that delivered the Empire from the usurpation of the Magi, he divided the whole into seven Governments; Herodotus saith, into twenty Satrapies.

He afterward followed Cambyle into Egypt ; he then joined with the reſt of the Princes againſt the Magi, and either by the nying of his horſe, or, as others affirm, by ſtrong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more aſſured to himſelf by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Nieces for his wives.

§. II.

Of Darius his Government, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

Darius devised equal laws whereby his Subjects might be Governed, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gave access to all his Subjects, and behaved himself so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassals: Only he laid divers payments and taxes on the people, which had not been accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of fourteen thousand five hundred and three-score talents, saith Herodotus.

The war which Cambyses made a far off in Egypt, and the contention between the Mages, and the Princes of Persia, for the Emperors gave heart to the Babylonians to recover their liberty, and to shake off the Persian yoke; whereof Darius being advertised, he prepared an Army to recover that City and State revolted. But finding the fame a difficult work, he used the service of Zopyrus, who for the love he bare Darius, did cut off his own Ears and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to fly to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who, for having given him advice to give over the siege of their City, had in this fort diminished and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gave him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition and commandment of their greatest forces: which when Zopyrus had obtained, after some small colourable over-throws given to the Persians upon sallies, he delivered the City into Darius his hands; who had lyen before it twenty months.

§. III.

Of Darius his favour to the Jews in building the Temple.

IN the second year of Darius, he gave order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should go on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his own charge, and out of the revenues of the Crown. And whereas the Governours of those Provinces which are situate between Exra. c. 6. Explorates and the Phœnician, and midland Sea (whom Exra calleth the Captains beyond the River) had hindered the work in Cambyfes his time, Darius gave commandment that they should not thenceforth come near unto Jerusalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they should withdraw themselves, and get them far off till all were finished, and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis: With-draw your selves far from them; In our Englisb, Be ye far from thence, to wit, from the City and Temple now in building.

He also made a Decree which concerned his own Subjects, That whosoever should thenceforth hinder the setting up of the Temple of God, that his house should be torn down, and the disturber hanged on the Gallows made of the timber thereof. He also, in the same Decree maketh invocation to God; That hath caused his Name to dwell there (to) destroy all Kings and people that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Jerusalem, &c. In four years after which Decree (the Jews being really furnished with money and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth year of Darius Hystaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first return.

§. IV

Of Darius his Scythian War.

AFTER the recovery of Babylon he invaded the Scythians, whose King Tystin calleth Laustimus; and saith, that Darius undertook this war against him, because he refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to convoy his Army into Scythia, he built a bridge of small Vessels over the River Ister or Danubius, and gave the custody of the same in charge (among others of Asia the less) to the Ionians and Æolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the

Asian Grecians to break down the bridge, to the end Darius might not return thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficulty; but the same was resisted by Hystian Prince of Milet, a City of Ionia, which Nation, being a Colony of the Greeks, Diad. l. 11. Diodorus calleth Traytors to their Country, because they joyned themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaves, for as much as they would not run away from their Master, but were more mindful of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as fair an occasion of liberty as could have been desired. For the great Army of Darius entering the desert Country called Bessarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustenance to relieve them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chirm Tartars, their posterity, at this day, all horse-men, using the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Graziers, driving their Herds from one place to another, as opportunity of Pasture led them. Standing Towns they had none, but used for Houses the Waggon wherein they carried their wives and children. These Waggon they place at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Town, removeable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himself, called now the great Chirm, any other City than such as Agora, (as they name it) or town of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himself, and wasted his provision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither ways to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitful trees, or living creatures, nor any thing at all, which either he himself might make use of, or by destroying it might grieve his enemies, he began to perceive his own folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet setting a good face upon a bad game, he sent brave messengers to the Scythians, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make trial of his valour and fortune in plain battle; Or, if he acknowledged himself the weaker, then to yield by fair means, and become his Subject; giving him Earth and Water, which the Perfians used to demand as a sign that all was yielded unto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphical answer; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and five Arrows: which dumb shew Darius interpreting by his own wit, thought that he did yield all the Elements wherein those creatures live, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the seven Princes, who had slain slain the Magi, construed their meaning aright, which was thus; O ye Perfians, get ye wings like Birds, or dive under the water, or creep into holes in the earth, for else ye shall not escape our arrows. And this interpretation was soon verified by the Scythians themselves, who assailed the Perfian camp, drove the horse-men into the trenches, and vexed the Army with continual Allarums day and night; were so fearless of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and even in his sight, they did not forbear the pastime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldness of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forsook his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were sick and weak behind him, and so with all speed marched away towards the River Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians, who mist him; yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Perfian King should never more be able to do them either good or harm. Which words had certainly been proved true, had not Hystian the Milesian prevailed with his people, to attend the coming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise fail to meet, when they returned from Ister to seek him out.

§. V.

Some actions of the Perfians in Europe, after the Scythian War.

Darius having thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the invasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which War he employed Megabazus, who mastered the Pæonians, and transplanted them, and posset Perinthus, Chalcedon, Byzantium, and other places, being also soon after subjected, and added to the Perfian Empire by Otanes, the son of Sylaxmus, whom Cambyfes had excommunicated for false judgement. So were the Cities of * Scythia, and * Cardia likewise taken in from the Perfian, who having now reduced under his obedience the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadors to Amintas King of Macedon adjoining, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Sovereignty over that Kingdom. Amintas doubting his own strength, entertained the Embassadors with gentle words, and afterwards invited them to a solemn and magnificent feast; the Perfians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Embassadors, who were well filled with wine, and preluded upon their greatness and many Victories, began to use such embracings, and other lascivious behaviour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings son, great Grandfather to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Perfians barbarous presumption, beforesight his Father to with-draw himself from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadors, whom withall he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promising their speedy return. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-favoured young men to clothe themselves in the same garments, and to use the same attitudes which the Ladies had worn at the feast, giving them in charge, That when the Perfians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soon after given by Darius for a severe revenge of this murder: But Alexander somewhat before the death of Amintas, gave his sister Gygea in marriage to Eubaris, a principal Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpful the Alliance of Macedon would prove for the invasion of Attica intended, so prevailed, as Alexander escaped that tempest, which threatened to fall upon him very suddenly; the war of Asia the less, called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

§. VI.

The first occasion of the War which Darius made upon Greece, with a rehearsal of the government in Athens, whence the quarrel grew.

NOW the better to understand the reason and motives of that great War, which followed soon after, between the Perfians and Grecians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which City endured the hardest and worst ruin of Darius invasion on that side the Sea, with admirable success. Neither do I hold it any impertinency to be large in unfolding every circumstance of so great a business as gave fire to those wars, which never could be thoroughly quenched, until in the ruin of this great Perfian Monarchy. Persopolis the Capital City of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadful, as in the pride of their greatness, the Perfians had raised in Athens.

Now

Now therefore as out of the former books it may be gathered, how Athens and other parts of Greece, were antiently Governed, the same being already fed down, though scattering, and in several times, among other the Contemporary occurrences of the Eastern Emperours, and the Kings of Judea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember again the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedæmonians, they maintained still their ancient polity under Kings, though these also after some fifteen descents were bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians, in the former books remembred, who willingly died for the safety of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as (thinking none worthy to succeed him) they changed their former Government from Monarchical to Princes for term of life, of which Medon the Son of Codrus was the first, after whose death they were called Medontides; and of these there were twelve Generations belides Medon, to wit, Ageſtus, in whose times the Greeks transported themselves into Ionia, after Troy an hundred and fourcore years, according to Fulgius: which migration all other Chronologers (such as follow Enſebius herein excepted) find in the year after Troy fallen one hundred and forty.

Solon, and others, who are the less to be regarded, by reason of the yearly change.

This Solon being a man of excellent wisdom, gave Laws to the Athenians, which were published, according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth year of Tarquinus Priſtus, and were in after ages derived unto the Romans, and by the Decem-viri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into Twelve Tables, which were the ground of the Roman Laws. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his own days violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed unto the practice and maintenance of a popular Government; the state of Athens was very soon changed into a Monarchy by Piſſistratus the son of Hipparchus: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus, two Citizens of Noble Families, were become the heads, took occasion by their contention and infolency to raise a third faction more powerful than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in General. Having by this means obtained love and credit, he wounded himself, and fained that by malice of his enemies he had like to have been slain for his love to the good Citizens; he procured a Guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprising the State-house, or Cittadel of Athens, he made himself Lord of the Town; Hegſistratus being then governour. But the Citizens, who in every change of Government had fought to remove themselves further and further from the form of a Monarchy, could so ill brook this usurpation of Piſſistratus, that he was driven for lack of help, to fly the Town, as soon as Megacles and Lycurgus (joining their forces) attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his Tyranny, founded upon the dissention of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; so was it soon soon after well re-edified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his own, he did (as is the usual practice of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Piſſistratus, to whom he gave his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Family of the Alcæmonides, whereof Megacles was chief, became very powerful, yet so, that Piſſistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alcæmonides, and especially Megacles, being inclined against Piſſistratus for his misdemeanour towards his Wife. Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Town, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so far, that Piſſistratus (upon the first discovery of their intent) perceived no other remedy for his affairs, than to withdraw himself to Eretria, where he remained eleven years. While time being expired, having hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, he again recovered the principality of Athens: after which third obtaining his estate, he governed Athens seventeen years, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirty and four years, saith Elianus, but, as Justin hath it, four and thirty; accounting the time be like as well before, as after his several expulsions. Herodotus gives the Father and the Son six and thirty years; Aristotle five and thirty. But Thucydides affirmeth, that he died very old, leaving for his Successors, his two Sons, Hippias and Hipparchus, who governed the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seemed the Lineal Successors of a natural Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and some three years before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his Brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And, though Hipparchus was charged with unnatural lust after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince as of many eminent virtues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers, and authors of that scandal. Hippias fearing that this enterprise upon his Brother had more and deeper roots than were apparent, first sought to discover the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who, because she would not reveal her Companions, did cut out her own tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himself, enter into a strait amity with Xantides, Tyrant of the City Lampſacus, whom he knew to be greatly favoured by Darius, to whose Son Hippocles he gave one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three years after the death of his Brother, doubting I know not what strong practice against himself, he began to use the Citizens with great severity, which neither Piſſistratus the Father, nor Hippias himself had ever exercised, during their usurpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this disease might rather increase than diminish in Hippias, they stirred up Clisthenes, one of the noblest and best able of their City, to practise their delivery: who, calling to his assistance the banished Alcæmonides, together with an Army of the Lacedæmonians led by Cleomenes their King, so afflicted Hippias, as by his composition he gave over his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence embarking himself took Land at * Sigæum, whence he went to Lampſacus in Asia governed by Xantides, who presented him to Darius. He was deprived of his estate, as Herodotus and Thucydides agree, twenty years before the battle of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Xantides, at other times with Ariſtophanes Lieutenant for Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia; perſwading and practising the enterprise upon Athens, which Darius in the end to his great dishonour undertook, twenty years after Hippias had resigned his estate.

Thus far I have digressed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceive the better, the causes and motives of this War: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be restored to Athens by the help of Darius, which made him solicit and perſwade the Perſians to conquer Greece, was one, but not the most urgent.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principal cause of the Wars ensuing between Greece and Perſia.

Another, and a strong motive to this expedition, was the Ionick War, breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece into Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Seacoast, having enjoyed their liberty about 500 years, even from the Ionick migration, to the time of Croſus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcel of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Servants to the Crown of Perſia.

conquered (witness Ireland) to rebell again upon every advantage and opportunity : so did the Ionians, and other Gracians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seek by all means possible to free themselves.

At this time they found such men ready to spurn them into Rebellion, as had by the Perfian been given unto them for bridles to hold them in subjection. Every one of those Towns had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the Government of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Perfian, by whose only might they held the people in subjection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when Darius, being in great extremity, they used all means to deliver him and his Army (that otherwise had been lost) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of service Histians the Tyrant of Aleutis expected the chief thanks, as having been chief Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their own desires, were ready to have abandoned him. But it came so to pass, that Darius being more fearful of the harm that Histians (being powerful and crafty) might do to him in the future, than mindful of the good which he had already received at his hand, found means to carry him along to Susa, where he detained him with all kind usage of a friend, yet kept such good espial upon him, as an enemy, he could not start away. Histians had subtilty enough to discover the Kings purpose, which ill agreed with his own desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one fair City, having a small Territory, than to sit and feast at the great King's Table, and hear the Councils by which a large Empire was managed; being himself an idle beholder, and enjoying with much restraint of liberty, none other pleasures than a private man might bestow upon himself.

Wherefore he bethought himself of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacifie which, if he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authority in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfy the King with excuses, or deal as occasion shall require. Resolving upon this course, he sent very secret instructions to Ariflagoras his kinsman, whom he had left his Deputy at Aleutis, advising him to stir up some Rebellion. These directions came seasonably to Ariflagoras, who having failed in an enterprise upon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Perfian his Associate, stood in fear of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might befall him, as one that had wasted the King's treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counsel : and the better to draw the whole Countrey of Ionis into the same course which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyranny, and did set Aleutis at liberty. This plausible beginning wan unto him the hearts of the Aleutians : and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he took and sold as slaves to their Citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to be at his command. The Perfian Fleet, whereof he lately had been Admiral in the enterprise of Naxos, he had surprized in his first breaking out, together with the principal Officers and Captains; so that now he thought himself able to deal with the great King's forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be upon his neck, and crush both him and his assistants to pieces, unless he were able to raise an Army that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were insufficient to perform. Therefore he took a journey to Sparta, where having assayed in vain with many arguments, and the offer of fifty Talents, to win to his party Cleomenes King of the Lacedaemonians : he went from thence to Athens, and with better success befought the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Ambassadors which had been sent to the Perfian Kings Lieutenant in the lower Asia, desiring them not to give countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answers, having found very churlish entertainment. So that the evil which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Perfians, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinity with the Ionians, and the persuasions of Ariflagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twenty ships the Athenians furnished for this Voyage; to which the Eratrarians furnished five more, in regard of the ancient Kindness that had passed between the Ionians and them. With these and their own forces joyned, the Ionians entered the River Caistrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephesus : by which advantage they surprized Sardis, when no enemy was heard of or suspected; in somuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of safety, than by retreating himself into the Castle, which the Gracians could not force : from whence he beheld beheld the slaughter of the Citizens, and the City flaming.

The Perfians, at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recovered the Market-place, strengthened by the River Paddolus, which ran thorow it; and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselves, and charged their enemies; who well advising themselves, made all the haste they could toward the Sea-side. But Artaphernes having gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Gracians, and found them near Ephesus; where setting resolutely upon them, he slaughtered a great part of their Army, the rest saving themselves in Ephesus. In this fight, Eucleides, Captain of the Eratrarians perished : but his fame and memory was by that excellent Poet Simonides preserved. After this overthrow, the Athenians, which were before sent unto Ariflagoras, and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, nor by their tears, be perswaded to make any second trial of their fortunes on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noise in the world, than the late good success which the Perfians had in one or two skirmishes, could raise. Wherefore the Ionians bravely proceeded, won a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleet into the Hellefont, got Bizantium and other Towns into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyfes, began hereupon to take heart; and entering into confederacy with the Ionians, who were able to give them aid by Sea, rebelled against the Perfians.

These news coming to the ear of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, upon whom he vowed to take sharp revenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to think, that they would not have dared to attempt such things, but by the instigation of those, to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to provoke him. This was the main ground of the War commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes, against Athens : To which the solicitation of Hippias, before remembered, gave only some form and assistance : the business, when once it was thus far on foot, being like enough to have proceeded, though he had perished, ere it were advanced any further.

Some other occurrences in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrel of Darius against many of the Islanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greeks; for all of them gave to his Rebels free harbour : the Islanders moreover did help to furnish out a Navy of three hundred and sixty Sail against him. These provocations did rather breed in him a desire to abate their pride, than any fear of harm that they were like to do him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprize. In every fight they were beaten by the Perfians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captains. In one Sea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the upper hand; but they were Phenicians, Egyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished : neither was that victory of any use to them; the Cyprians, in whole aid they came, being utterly beaten by the Perfian Army at Land, and reduced into their old subjection. So had the Perfians likewise by open War and fair force overthrown the Carians in two battels, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Towns upon Hellefont, with some Aeolian and Ionian Cities, when Ariflagoras with his friends quitting Aleutis, fled into Thrace, desirous to seat himself in Amphipolis, a Colony of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territory belike he landed, overthrew him, and cut his troops in pieces.

About the same time, Histians, the first mover of this insurrection, came down into those quarters; who having undertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whom his double-dealing was detected.

But this Evafion preserved him not long. And after many vain attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Perfians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him upon remembrance of old good turns; as it seems that he would have done, by the burial which he commanded to be given to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heavy taking of his death.

Histians had sought to put himself into Aleutis; but the Citizens, doubting his conditions, chose rather to keep him out, and make shift for themselves, without his help. The strength of their City by Land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings; and their good Fleet, which promised unto them the liberty of an open Sea, emboldened them to try the uttermost, when very few friends were left upon that Continent to take their part. But their Navy was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking them upon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causeless flight of those that should have assisted them. Neither was it long before the Town itself, being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slain, their wives and children made slaves, and their goods a booty to the Persians; whom for six years space they had put to so much trouble.

§. VIII.

The War which Darius made upon Greece with the battell of Marathon, and Darius his death.

THis War with good success finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable success; Darius obtained in the enterprise and Conquest of Greece (though at first he intended to make the War but against the Athenians and Eretrians, who jointly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his Ambassadors, demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whom, some of them not so well resolved as the rest, submitted themselves; as the Eginets, and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians) after divers encounters forced them to give pledges, and to relinquish the party of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedæmonians in this War, and caused his companion King Demantus to be depicted: who thereupon fled to Darius, for the more confident victory, by reason of these discords, alienations, and civil Wars among the Greeks. He therefore gave order to Hippagorus to prepare a Fleet of Ships, fit to transport his Army over the Hellespont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. The charge in chief of his Army he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the Son of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athens twenty years before, and by Artaphernes his Brother, Governour of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the less. These Commanders having their Companies brought down to the Sea-side, embarked themselves in six hundred Gallies and other Vessels; and first of all attempted the islands, called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way between Asia the less, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces over the Ægean Sea; but on the contrary they might always both relieve themselves in the passage, and shroud themselves from all sudden tempests and out-rage.

To this end, they first possessed themselves of Samos; secondly, they attempted Naxos: Which Island, the Inhabitants despairing of their own forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was native: Which Island Darius did not only forbear to sack, but recalling the inhabitants, he gave order to beautify the places and Altars of Sacrifice to Apollo erected. And having recovered these & other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Eubœa: for that City (as already hath been shewed) had assisted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians took ground, and besieged Eretria very straitly, and after six days assault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Eupubus and Philagias, they took it, sacked it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus far the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sails. From Eubœa the Persians part their Army into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed, towards Athens.

The Athenians, finding the time arrived wherein they were to dispute with their own virtues against Fortune, and to cast lots for their liberty, for their wives, their children, and their lives, put themselves in the best order they could to make resistance, and with all sent away with speed to the Lacedæmonians for succour, employing in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who passing through Arcadia, encountered in the way a familiar Devil, which he supposed to be Satan, who willed him to allure the Athenians of victory, promising that some one of the gods should be present at the battell, to assist them and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his return, seeing he could not bring with him any present succours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly availing to bring news from the gods, and promise of assistance from Heaven, which no doubt (though the device was somewhat likely to be his own, yet) it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages have been more stirred up with fond Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any just cause or solid reason.

The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand only of the Platæans (who having been formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans, did in this this extremity witness their thankfulness & grateful disposition) began to dispute, Whether it were most for their advantage to defend the walls of Athens, or to put themselves into the field with such forces as they had, the same consisting of ten thousand Athenians, and one thousand of the Platæans. In the end, and after great diversity of opinions, Miltiades, who perswaded the trial by battel, prevailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves into three troops: two wings or horns, as they term them; and the body of a battel. The Persians when they perceived so small a troop advancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather disposed of their understandings, than possessed with the resolution whereof they made shew. So invincible and resistless the Persians esteemed their own numbers to be, and that small troop of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withal: But in conclusion, the Victory being doubtfully balanced for a while, sometimes the virtue of the Grecians, and sometimes the number of the Persians prevailed; the Grecians fighting for all that they had, the Persians for that they needed not, these great forces of Darius were disordered and put in rout; the Athenians following their Victory even to the Sea-shore; where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, saved themselves in their Ships.

The Persian Army consisted of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse; of which there were slain in the place six thousand three hundred, and of the Grecians an hundred fourscore and twelve. For howsoever it came to pass, either by strange visions, which were afterward called Pannic terror, or by some other affright, it seemed that the invading Army, after the first encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Herodotus set down, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Justin's report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Army were slain, the same hath no appearance nor possibility of truth. In this fight Hippias the perswader of the enterprise was slain, faith Justin and Cicero; but Suidas tells us, That he escaped, and died most miserably in Lemnos.

The greatest honour of this Victory was cast upon Miltiades, who both perswaded the trial by battel, and behaved himself therein answerably to the counsel which he gave. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beard. Those of the Grecians, of mark and commandment, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stesileus. It is also said, That Cynegrus following the Persians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to have held it from putting off the shore, and having his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which also being deprived, he took hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first year of the three-score and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the war made by Corollanus against his fellow-Romans: Alexander the Son of Antony being then King of Macedonia, and Phanippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutarch, or Hybilde, after Halgear-naglaus.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned back into the lesser Asia, Miltiades fought and obtained an employment against the Islanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing over his Companies in threescore and ten Gallies, after six and twenty days assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himself being made unable, and his Companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those ungrateful Citizens forgetting all his services past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battel of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xantippus, the father of Pericles (who envied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fifty Talents; where his weak and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few days ended his life.

Which envy of the better sort to each other, with their private Factions, assisted by the unthankfull and witless people, brought them, not many years after, from a Victorious and famous Nation, to base subjection and slavery. Miltiades left behind him one son called Cymon begotten on Hegespila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his Father in valour, nor to Themistocles in understanding, but exceeded them both in Justice and good Government.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recover his honour, than sorrow for the loss received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, and all other warlike provisions. But the Egyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdom of great strength and revenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the re-invasion of Greece. The diligence also among

And lastly, Death, who hath no respect of any mans affairs, gave end to all his consultations and enterprises, and joynd him

CHAP. VI.

Of Xerxes.

§. I.

The preparations of Xerxes against Greece.

Xerxes received from his Father, as hereditary, a double War, one to be made against the Egyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Grecians, of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the success ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this War, which was chiefly bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were divided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, under Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his Grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Artozofres, perwaded by many arguments the European War. But Artabanes, Brother to the late Darius, and Uncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsel, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous success of the two late Invasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsel: The one in person upon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants upon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his Enemies both his Army and his Honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well advised before he did too far imbrake himself in this business. For whatsoever undertaking hath deliberate and sound counsel for conductor, though the success do not always answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variableness of his own nature, which only the Divine Providence, and not any humane power, can constrain.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanes, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made known to all those that opposed his desire to this War (changing opinion and counsel) assisted the Grecian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the War of Egypt was ended, four years were consumed in describing and gathering an Army for this invasion: which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Persian Empire, consisted of seventeen hundred thousand foot, and eighty thousand Horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts of Carriage, if we may believe Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus finds the number less by seven hundred thousand footmen.

The Commanders of the several Nations were the Princes of the blood of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise; for to these were all commandments of this nature given, some few people excepted, who had of their own Leaders.

The charge of the whole Army was bestowed on Mardonius, the Son of Gobrias, by a sister of Darius, to whom were joynd some others of Xerxes his nearest kindred, as Generals over all; saving that the charge of ten thousand select Persians, called the Immortal Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died, or were slain, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was given to Hydarnes; the eighty thousand horsemen were led by the sons of Datis, who commanded the late Army of Darius in Greece.

The

The Fleet of Gallies were 2200. and eight furnished by the Phœnicians, who had Commanders of their own Nation, and by the Cypriots, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Lyicians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Æolians, and Hellefontines; who were trusted with the furnishing of their own Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Persia, as by Artabignes, the Son of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certain Gallies furnished by Artemesia, the daughter of Lygdamis, Princes of Halicarnassus, and the Islands adjoining, which her self commanded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Zidon, in which Xerxes himself was imbraked.

§. II.

Xerxes Army entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his Bridge of Boats over the Hellespont: and the discourse between him and Artabanus upon the view of the Army.

When this World of an Army was thoroughly furnished, he caused all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendezvous, and repair at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had assembled to the number of seventeen hundred thousand foot, as he entered the border of Celæna, he was by one Pythius a Lydian Herd of Cattel gave food to Xerxes and his whole Army. The feast ended, he also presented him with two thousand Talents of Silver, and in Gold four Millions, wanting even thousand of the Persian Darics; which make so many of our Marks.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberality of Pythius, did not only refuse his treasure offered, but commanded that seven thousand Darics should be given him to make up his four Millions; of which, so many thousands were wanting when he made the Present. But soon after, when Pythius besought him to spare one of his five sons from his attendance into Greece (because himself was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his own son) Xerxes most barbarously caused the young man, for whom his father fought exemption, to be sundered into two parts, commanding that the one half of his Carcass should be layed on the right, and the other half on the left hand of the common way by which the Army marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-side. The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the same (with the half Island or Headland, whereon it stood) to be an entire Island, sundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountain and the Cheremeses, or Neck of Land it self: a work of more ostentation, than of use, and yet an enterprize of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent having but twelve furlongs (which make about a mile and a half) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to pass in front. The Cities so severed from the main, were Dion, Olophysus, Acrotboom, Thysus, and Cleone.

He also gave order, that a Bridge upon Boats should be made over the Hellepont between Abidus and Sestos, the Sea there having a mile of breadth, wanting an eighth part; which, after the finishing, was by a Tempest torn asunder and dissembled: where-with Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commanded those to be slain that were masters of the work, and caused six hundred three score and fourteen Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and industry of the Phœnicians, was so well anchored to resist both winds blowing into, and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boarded and railed, the whole Army of seventeen hundred thousand foot, and four score thousand Horse, with all the Moyle and Carriages, past over it into Europe in seven dayes and seven nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armies did Cæsar afterward use. And Caligula, that mad Emperor, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Army brought neer to the Sea-side, Xerxes took a view of all his Troops, assembled in the Plains of Abidus, being carried up, and seated on a place over-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adjoining: and after he had gloried in his own happiness, to behold and command so many Nations, and so powerfull an Army and Fleet, he suddenly (not withstanding) burst out into tears, moved with this contemplation, That in one hundred years there should not any one survive of that marvellous multitude: the cause of which sudden change of passion when he uttered to Artabanus his Uncle, Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which

which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troop within that number of years by the King remembered, is, That the life it self which we enjoy is yet more miserable than the end thereof: for in those few days given us in the world, there is no man among all these, or elsewhere, that ever found himself so accompanied with happiness, but that he oftentimes pleased himself better with the desire and hope of death, than of living; the incident calamities, diseases, and sorrows whereto mankind is subject, being to many and inevitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appear unto us over long; to avoid all which, there is neither refuge nor rest, but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to overcast those joys which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtful conceit, that Artabanus utterly condemned the invasion of Greece, against which he had formerly given many strong reasons, desired him to deal freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous; or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good success? Artabanus, notwithstanding that he assured himself of the Kings resolution to go on, and dared not by any new arguments to batter the great purpose it self, yet he told the King, That there were two things which marvellously affrighted him, and which the King should find, as he feared, to be most adverse; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the World any Port capable of so great a Fleet; inasmuch, as if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Havens thereof afford them any safety; and therefore when any such shelter shall be wanting unto them, he prayed him to understand, that in such a case of extremity, men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other inconveniences, will be found by so much the more an enemy, by how much the unsatiate desire of man to obtain more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to give resistance, yet the want of means to feed such an Army, and the Famine which cannot be prevented, will without any other violence offered, disfigure and consume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to have diverted Xerxes, not daring perchance to utter what indeed he most feared, to wit, the overthrow of the Army it self both by Sea and Land, which soon after followed. These cautions were exceeding weighty, if Xerxes his obstinacy had not misprised them. For to invade by Sea upon a perilous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succoured by any party, may better fit a Prince presuming on his fortune, than enriched with understanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second upon England in the year 1588, who had belike never heard of this Council of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point; It is very likely that Xerxes his Army, which could not have in it less than two millions of Souls, besides his beasts for Service and Carriage, should after a few days suffer famine, and using Machiavels words, Mourir sans secours; die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait, and mountainous Countrey, to yield food (besides what served themselves) for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they never meant to entertain, but with the sharpened points of their Weapons, destroying withall whatsoever they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may believe Herodotus, the Army of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermopylae, consisted of five millions, two hundred eighty three thousand, two hundred twenty men, besides Laundresses, Harlots, and Horses, and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that whoever should enterprise any great matter, if he gave the hearing to all that could be objected of accidental inconveniences, he should never pursue the same farther than the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had never grown to that greatness, or possessed so many Kingdoms and Nations, as they now did; and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were never undertaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessity had enforced him to that war. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he already commanded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerful prosperity of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes his Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Darius had made a dear experience) the fruit of this War was answerable answerable to the plantation, and the success and end agreeable to the weak counsel whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his own judgement not sufficient, (for he gathered in, marching on, all the strength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to fear the Greeks by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those uncountable multitudes: Non vires habent, sed pondus; & impedimenta potius sunt, quam auxilium: They are great in bulk, but weak in forces, and rather a luggage than an aid.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshal such a world of men in one Army, so the divers Nations, speaking divers languages, bred the same confusion among the Persian Commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to work. Whereas if Xerxes had of his five millions compounded ten Armies of fifty thousand chosen Souldiers in each, and sent them yearly into Greece well victualled and furnished, he had either prevailed by the sword, or forced them to forsake their territory, brought them into obedience by necessity and famine, which cannot be refuted. But while Xerxes resolved to cut down the banks of Greece, and to let in a sea of men upon them, he was deceived both of his own hopes, and in their hearts whom he employed, and beaten by the Greeks, both by Land and Sea; yea, he himself, conducted by his fear, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Army was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintered in Thessaly, and led by Mardonius who perwaded the enterprise, was in the summer following utterly defeated, and himself slain.

§. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylae and Artemisium.

After such time as Xerxes had transported the Army over the Hellaspont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the description of his passage along that Coast, and how the River of Lissus was drunk dry by his multitudes, and the Lake near to Pisgirus by his cattle, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will speak of the encounters he had, and the shameful and incredible overthrows which he received. As first at Thermopylae, a narrow passage of half an acre of ground, lying between the Mountains which did divide Thessaly from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedaemonians, assisted with one thousand Tegate and Marineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponneseans, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole; besides one thousand Phocians, four hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole days together against that huge Army of the Persians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first days fight, Xerxes is said to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Army by one handful of those men whom not long before he had utterly despised: and when the second days attempt upon the Greeks had proved vain, he was altogether ignorant how to proceed further; and so might have continued, had not a runaway Grecian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Army might ascend the ledge of mountains, and set upon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Army had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greeks, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedaemonians with his three hundred, and seven hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not only resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slain upon the place. Xerxes, having lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Souldiers and Captains, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconvenience might befall him by the virtue of such as had not been present at these battles, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deal. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great fear, whose manhood had appeared singular in this trial, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring into the field. It is reported of Dioneces the Spartan, that when one thought to have terrified him by saying, That the flight of the Persian Arrows was so thick as would hide the Sun, he answered thus; It is very good news, for then shall we fight in the cool shade.

Such notable resolution having as freely been expressed in deeds, as was uttered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the City of Sparta could arm well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedæmonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore healked counsel of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had alwaies well advised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces should assemble together to defend the Isthmus, that Isthmic neck of ground which joyneth Peloponnesus to the Continent. For which cause he advised, That three hundred ships well manned, should be sent unto the Coast of Laconia, to spoil the Country, and to hold the Lacedæmonians and their neighbours busied at home, whilst Xerxes at his leisure having subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power upon them, who remaining destitute of succour, would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further advised, That the said Fleet of three hundred ships should seize upon the Island then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying near to the Coast of Laconia, might serve as a fit place of Rendezvous upon all occasions, either of their own defence, or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Lacedæmonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrymen to have that Isle drowned in the Sea, than stand so inconveniently for them as it did. What effect this counsel might have taken, had it been followed, it is not easie to guess. But a contrary opinion of Achæmenes, Brother to King Xerxes, was preferred as the safer. For the Persian Fleet had been sorely vexed with a grievous tempest, which continued three whole daies together, wherein were lost upon the Coast of Magnesia, four hundred ships of War, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseen, that if any such calamity should overtake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to give them succour. Therefore Achæmenes, perswaded his Brother not to disperse his Fleet; for if (said he) after the loss of four hundred ships we shall send away other three hundred to seek adventures, then will the Greeks be strong enough by Sea to encounter the rest of the Navy, which holding all together, is invincible. To this counsel Xerxes yielded, hoping that his Land Army and Fleet, should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilst both held one course, and lay not far asunder. But herein he was far deceived; For about the same time that his Army had felt the valour of the Greeks by Land, his Navy likewise made a sorrowful proof of their skill and courage at Sea. The Grecian Fleet lay at that time at Artimesium, in the straits of Eubœa, where the Persians thinking to encompass them, sent two hundred sail about the Island to fall upon them behind, using a like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas, in a case not unlike, but with far different success. For that narrow channel of the Sea, which divideth Eubœa from the main, was in the fame fort held by a Navy of two hundred three score and eleven sail against the huge Persian Armado, as the straits of Thermopylae had formerly been maintained by Leonidas, till he was circumvented, as this Navy might have been, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Island, and the cause of their voyage, was too well known in the Persian Fleet, and soon enough disclosed to the Greeks, who setting sail by night, met them with a counter-surprise, taking and sinking thirty vessels, forcing the rest to take the Sea; where, being over-taken with foul weather, they were driven upon the Rocks, and cast all away. Contrariwise, the Navy of the Greeks were increased by the arrival of fifty three Athenian ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their party in the last fight. As these new forces encouraged the one side, so the fear of Xerxes his displeasure stirred up the other to redeem their loss with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their unfortunate policy, they resolved in plain fight to repair their honour, and casting themselves into the form of a Crescent, thought so to inclose the Greeks, who readily did present them battel at Artemesium.

The fight endured from noon till night, and ended with equal loss to both parts. For, though more of the Persians ships were sunk and taken, yet the lesser loss fell altogether as heavy upon the Greekish Fleet, which being small, could worse bear it: Herein only the Barbarians may seem to have had the worse, that they forsook the place of fight, leaving the wrack and spoils to the enemy, who nevertheless were fain to abandon presently even the passage which they had undertaken to defend; both for that many of their ships were sorely crushed in the battel, and especially because they had received advertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylae. Before they weighed Anchors, chors, Themistocles, General of the Athenians, engraved upon stone at the watering-place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they should revolt unto the Greeks, or stand neutral; which perswasion, he hoped, would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

§. IV.

The attempt of Xerxes upon Apollo's Temple: and his taking of Athens.

WHEN Xerxes had past the straits of Thermopylae, he waited the Country of the Phocians, and the regions adjoining: as for the Inhabitants, they chose rather to fly, and reserve themselves to a day of battel, than to adventure their lives into his hands, upon hope of saving their wealth, by making proffer unto him of their service. Part of his Army he sent to spoil the Temple of Delphi, which was exceeding rich by means of many Offerings that had been made by divers Kings, and great personages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inventory than of the goods left in his own Palace. To make relation of a great astonishment that fell upon the companies which arrived at the Temple to have sacked it, and of two Rocks that breaking from the Mount Parnassus, overwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peradventure somewhat superfluous. Yet Herodotus, who lived not long after, saith, That the broken Rocks remained even to his memory in the Temple of Minerva, whither they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he believed that Apollo was a god, he should not have dared to entertain a covetous desire of inriching himself by committing sacrilege upon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that license to chastise his impiety, in such manner as is reported, was granted unto the Devil, by that Holy One, who saith, Will a man spoil his gods? and elsewhere; Hadst any Nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Go to the Isles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Kedar, and take diligents heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impiety of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alleged the burning of Cybele's Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the City of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the waste which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprize against Delphos, this vizzor of holy and zealous revenge falling off, discovered the face of covetousness so much the more ugly, by how much the more themselves had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by meer mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: He came to Athens, which finding forsaken, he took, and burnt the Cittadel, and Temple, which was therein. The Cittadel indeed was defended a while by some of more courage than wisdom, who literally interpreting Apollo's Oracle, That Athens should be safe in wooden walls, had fortified that place with Boards and Palisadoes; too weak to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might have yielded it upon tolerable conditions, had they not vainly relied upon the Prophecy: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the Interpreter, applying rather the words to the present need, than fashioning the business to words.

§. V.

How Themistocles the Athenian drew the Greeks to fight at Salamis.

THE Athenians had, before the coming of Xerxes, removed their wives and children into Traxene, Ægina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedom, and the common liberty of Greece. Nevertheless, this great zeal, which the Athenians did shew for the general good of their Country, was ill requited by the other Greeks, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilst they removed their wives and children out of the City. But when the City of Athens was taken, it was presently resolved upon, that they should forsake the Isle of Salamis, and withdraw the Fleet to Isthmus: which neck of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponnesus by Land and Sea, leaving the rest of Greece, as indefensible, to the fury of the enemy. So should the Islands of Salamis and Ægina have been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of security) have been given over into merciless bondage. Against this resolution, Themistocles, Admiral of the Athenian Fleet, very strongly made opposition, but in vain. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with fear of losing their own, which they would not hazard, that no perfwasions could obtain of them to regard the estate of their distressed Friends and Allies. Many remonftrances Themistocles made unto them, to allure them to abide the enemy at Salamis: As first in private unto Eurybiades the Lacedæmonian, Admiral of the whole Fleet; That the selfsame fear which made them forsake those coasts of Greece, upon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to disserve the Fleet, and every one of the Confederates to withdraw himself to the defence of his own City and Estate: Then to the Council of War, which Eurybiades upon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might work in them hereafter;) he shewed, that the fight at Platæa would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the Straights; and that, besides the safeguard of Ægina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding where they then were, sufficiently defend Platæa; which the Barbarians should not so much as once look upon, if the Greeks obtained victory by Sea; which they could not so well hope for elsewhere, as in that present place which gave him so good advantage. All this would not serve to retain the Peloponnesians, of whom one, unworthy of memory, upbraided Themistocles with the loss of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speak in the Council, that had no Country of his own to inhabit. A base and shameful objection it was, to lay as a reproach that loss, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignity did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharp, as availed more than all his former perfwasions. He told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer City than any Nation of Greece could boast of; having well-near two hundred good ships of War, the better part of the Grecian Fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremity had refused to stand by them. Herewithal he mentioned a Town in Italy belonging of old to the state of Athens, of which Town he said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians, in process of time, should build it a-new; and there (quoth he) will we plant our selves, leaving unto you a forrowful remembrance of my words, and of your own unthankfulness. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much, began to enter into better consideration of the Athenians; whose affairs depended not, as they well perceived, upon so weak terms, that they should be driven to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might enforce the rest to yield to them, and condescend even to the uttermost of their own demands.

For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroical resolution, of leaving their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessity should enforce them so far, for the preservation of their liberty, did employ the most of their private wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Navy. By these means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamity should befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at Sea: Knowing well, that a strong Fleet would either procure victory at home, or a secure passage to any other Country. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships, they did somewhat amend their Navy. Whereby it came to pass, that, had they been vanquished, they could not have expected any other fortune, than either present death, or perpetual slavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by Sea did equal all theirs together; the whole consisting of more than three hundred and fourscore bottoms. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their own condition, which would have stood upon desperate points, if the Fleet of Athens had forsaken them, were soon perfwaded, by the greater fear of such a bad event, to forget the lesser, which they had conceived of the Persians; and laying aside their insolent bravery, they yielded to that most profitable counsel of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

How the Persians consulted about giving battle: and how Themistocles by policy held the Greeks to their resolution; with the victory at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the mean season, the Persians had entered into consultation, whether it were convenient to offer battle to the Greeks, or no. The rest of the Captains giving such advice as they thought would best please please the King their Master, had soon agreed upon the fight; but Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassus, who followed Xerxes to this War in person, was of contrary opinion: Her counsel was, that the King himself directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to pass, that the Greek Navy (unable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of provision) should presently be disfavoured, and every one seeking to preserve his own City and Goods, they should, being divided, prove unable to resist him, who had won so far upon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to give battle; so on the other side, the danger will be more (said she) which we shall undergo, than any need requireth us to adventure upon; and the loss, in case it fall upon us, greater than the profit of the Victory which we desire. For if we compel the enemies to fly, it is more than they would have done, we fitting still: but if they, as better Seamen than ours, put us to the work, the journey to Peloponnesus is utterly dash, and many that now declare for us, will soon revolt unto the Greeks. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the Fleet, related unto his Master the common consent of the other Captains, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King, well pleased with her advice, yet resolved upon following the more general, but far worse counsel of the rest; which would questionless have been the same which Artemisia gave, had not fear and flattery made all the Captains utter that, as out of their own judgement, which they thought to be most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeed that Xerxes had entertained a vain perfwasion of much good, that his own presence upon the shore to behold the conflict, would work among the Souldiers. Therefore he encamped upon the Sea-side, pitching his own Tent on the Mount Agialaw, which is opposite unto the Isle of Salamis, whence at ease he might safely view all which might happen in that action, having Scribes about him to write down the acts and behaviour of every Captain. The near approach of the Barbarians, together with the news of that timorous diligence which their Countrymen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Army, marching apace thither, did now again to terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no entreaty nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meer madness to fight for a Country already lost, when they rather should endeavour to save that which remained unconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what misery would befall them, if, losing the Victory, they should be driven into Salamis, there to be shut up, and besieged round in a poor desolate Island.

Hereupon they resolved forthwith to set sail for Platæa; which had presently been done, if the wisdom of Themistocles had not prevented it. For he perceiving what a violent fear had stopt up their ears against all good counsel, did practise another course, and forthwith labour to prevent the execution of this unwholesome decree; not suffering the very hour of performance to find him busie in wrangling altercation. As soon as the Council brake up, he dispatched secretly a truly Gentleman to the Persian Captains, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Navy about the Island, which inclosing the Greeks, might prevent their escape; giving them withall false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than believed these good news, well knowing that the Victory was their own assured, if the Athenian Fleet joyined with them; which they might easily hope, considering what ability their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captains with rich rewards, and the people with restitution of their City, and Territories. By these means it fell out, that when the Greeks very early in the morning were about to weigh Anchor, they found themselves inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all that night, sending many of their ships about the Isle of Salamis, to charge the enemy in rear, and landing many of their men in the Isle of Psittalea, which lyeth over against Salamis, to save such of their own, and kill such of the Grecian party, as by any misfortune should be cast upon the shore. Thus did meer necessity enforce the Grecians to undertake the battle in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable Victory, stemming the foremost of their enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foul one upon another, could neither conveniently fight nor fly. I do not find any particular occurrences in this great battle to be much remarkable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome task of writing down many disasters that befall the Persian Fleet, which ill acquitted it self that day, doing no one piece of service worthy the presence of their King, or the registering of his Notaries. As for the Greeks, they might well seem to have wrought out that Victory with equal courage, were it not that the principal principal honour of that day was ascribed to those of Agina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did fly towards Phalerus, where the Land-Army of Xerxes lay, the ships of Agina having possesst the Straights, did link or take them, whilst the Athenians did valiantly give charge upon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

Of things following after the battel of Salamis : and of the flight of Xerxes.

AFTER this Victory, the Greeks intending by way of Scrutiny, to determine which of the Captains had best merited of them, in all this great Service; every Captain, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write down his own name, but, in the second place, as best deserving next unto himself, almost every Suffrage did concur upon Themistocles. Thus private affection yielded unto virtue, as soon as her own turn was served. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamity, began to make new preparation for continuance of War; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discern his faint heart through his painted looks. Especially Mardonius, Author of the War, began to cast a wary eye upon his Master, fearing lest his counsel should be rewarded according to the event. Wherefore purposing rather to adventure his life in pursuit of the Victory, than to cast it away by undergoing his Princes indignation, he advised the King to leave unto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces he promised to reduce all Greece under the subjection of the Persian Scepter. Herewithall he forgot not to soothe Xerxes with many fair words, telling him, That the cowardice of those Egyptians, Phenicians, and Cilicians; with others of the like metal, nothing better than slaves, who had for ill behaved themselves in the late Sea-service, did not concern his honour, who had always been victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it self, against which the War was principally intended. These words found very good acceptance in the Kings ear, who presently betook himself to his journey homewards, making the more haste, for that he understood, how the Greeks had a purpose to sail to Hellspont, and there to break down his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greeks had no such intent, but rather wished his hasty departure, knowing that he would leave his Army not so strong, as it should have been, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades give counsel, that by no means they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, lest necessity should enforce the Persians to take more courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, under pretence of friendship, send a false advertisement unto this timorous Prince, advising him to convey himself into Asia with all speed, before his bridge were dissolved; which counsel Xerxes took very kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were (so that he found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torn in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driven to imbarck himself in some obscure vessel, it is not greatly material: though the Greeks did most willingly embrace the latter of these reports. Howsoever it were, this flight of his did well ease the Country, that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before overwhelmed it.

§. VIII.

The negotiations between Mardonius and the Athenians, as also between the Athenians and the Lacedemonians, after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thousand had withdrawn himself into Thessaly, whence he sent Alexander the son of Amyntus King of Macedon, as Ambassador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received; and of extending their Territories as far as their own desires; allowing them to retain their liberty and laws, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that War.

The Athenians had now re-entred their City, but not as yet brought back their wives and children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be secure, till the Army of Mardonius was broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedemonians, understanding what fair conditions this Ambassador would propound, were perplexed with very great fear, lest he should find good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they likewise very speedily dispatch their Embassadors for Athens, who arriving before the Macedonian had audience, used the best of their perswasion to retain the Athenians nians firm. They alledged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of War against the rest of Greece, but had only threatened the subversion of Athens; till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that City, were drawn into the quarrel, wherein the Athenians without much cruelty of injustice could not leave them. We know, said they, that ye have endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driven to forsake the Town, the houses thereof be ruined, and unfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we undertake to maintain as our own, your wives and children amongst us, as long as the War shall continue, hoping that ye, who have always procured liberty to others, will not now go about to bring all Greece into slavery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oaths are of no assurance. It was needles to use many arguments to the Athenians, who gave answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadors; That whilst the Sun continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither Gold nor any riches, with which he might seek to make purchase of their wives and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustain themselves, only desiring the Lacedemonians, that with all speed they would cause their Army to march, so far as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessaly, having once received such a peremptory answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius's readines to invade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For he, as soon as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith lead his Army towards them; and thence City: they having now the second time quitted it, and conveyed themselves into places of more security abroad in the Country, where they expected the arrival of their confederates. From Athens he sent his Agents unto them, with instructions, not only to persuade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principal of them to his party. His hope was, that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would be desirous to preserve them from fire, & to have those which were already laid waste, re-edified at the Kings charges; Or, if this affection took no place with them, but that needs they would rely upon their old confederats, whose succors did very slowly advance forwards, yet perhaps the leaders might be won with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects, if they should fail, the destruction of Athens would be a good mean to please his Master, King Xerxes; who mult thereby needs understand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their own Country. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him) Cyrillus, advised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propounded them to the people; all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Council-house, heard what he had said, immediately set upon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were fear or money, that had moved him to utter such a vile sentence. Yea, the women of Athens, and in the Isle of Salamis, hearing of his bad counsel, and bad end, assembling together did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All this bravery notwithstanding, when they perceived the slackness of the Peloponnesians in giving them aid, they were fain to betake themselves to Salamis again, the old place of their security. Remaining there, and seeing little forwardness in those whom, it most concerned to assist them, they sent very severe messages to Sparta, complaining of their slackness, and threatening withal, to take such course as might stand best with their own good, seeing that the common estate of all was so little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatory answers, which every day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded athwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedemonians waxed careless and dull, so the Athenians hotly pressed them to a quick resolution, giving them plainly to understand, that if they should hold on in those dilatory courses, it would not be long ere the City of Athens took a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian Fleet lay upon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw nearer unto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Navy contained it self within the Harbours upon Europe side; both to do service where need should require at home, and withal to shun the danger which might have befallen any part of it, that (being distracted from the rest) had ventured over-fer. So mutual fear preserved in quiet the Islands lying in the midst of the Aegean Seas. But it was well and seasonably observed by a Counsellor of Sparta, that the Wall upon Isthmus would serve serve to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gave ear to Mardonius: considering that many doors would be opened into that Demy-Iland, as soon as the Enemy should by winning the friendship of Athena, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedæmonians upon this admonition, making better perusal of their own dangers, were very careful to give satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadors, who not brooking their delays, were upon point of taking leave, yea, as it seemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away five thousand Spartans in the evening, under conduct of Pausanias, they gave audience the next day to the Embassadors, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readiness; deeply swearing that the Army of Sparta was already far upon the journey, and giving them leave to take up other five thousand Lacedæmonians, out of the Region adjoining, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though distasting such want of gravity, in a matter so important, were nevertheless contented with the final conclusion; and levying the number appointed of Lacedæmonian Souldiers, made what haste they could to incamp in Attica. The other Grecians were nothing slack in fending forth Companies, whose near approach caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much disadvantage to Horse, wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure he burnt the City of Athena, beating down the Walls offit, and ruining all that had formerly escaped the fury of War.

The great battel of Platæa.

IT were too long a rehearsal to shew all that happened in many skirmishes between the Greeks and him, in the Country of Bootia, which Mardonius had chosen to be the seat of that War. Much time was spent before the quarrel was decided by the trial of one main battel: for both parties did stand upon their guard, each expecting when the other should assail them.

The Army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Army; to whom were adjoynd the forces of Thebes, Macedonia, Thessaly, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persians, furnished his Camp with fifty thousand men. Against these the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leaved an Army of one hundred and ten thousand, of which forty thousand were weightily armed, the rest were only assistants to these forty thousand, being armed more slightly, as rather to make excursions and give chase, than to sustain any strong charges.

These two Armies having eleven days confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of service; Mardonius, whose vituals began to fail, resolved to begin the fray. The Greeks were promised Victory by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plain of Ceres and Proserpina, making prayers unto certain gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to find the certain place which the Oracle designed: For the plain of Ceres was indeed in the Territory of Athena; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, near unto the place where they lay at that time encamped; as likewise the memorials of those Nymphs and Demi-gods, were in the same place, upon Mount Cithæron; and the ground served well for footmen against horse; only the Land belonged unto the Platæans, and not unto the Athenians.

Whilst the Greeks were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtful Oracle, the Platæans, to make all clear, did freely bestow their Land on that side the Tow upon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Platæans caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to re-edifice their City; which was ruined in the Peloponnesian Wars.

All things being ready for battel, the Lacedæmonian General thought it most meet, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Ateides and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertain the Thebians and other Greeks which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them oftentimes before. This being agreed upon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedæmonians; which Mardonius understanding, (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Ateides and Persians had felt heavy proof, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the bravest Souldiers in Greece) he did also change the order of his battel, and oppose himself to Pausanias. All the Greeks might well perceive how the Enemy did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro.

Some

Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greeks at their watering-place, that they were fain to enter into consultation of retreating; because they could not without much loss to themselves, and none to the enemy, lye near to that fountain which did serve all the Camp. Having therefore concluded among themselves to dis-lodge; and part of the Army being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceed out of meer cowardice,) he charged them in the rear with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, that the Lacedæmonians being over-taken by the enemies horse, and over-whelmed with great flights of Arrows, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slain, and some of especial mark lost, before any sign of good success appeared in the entrails.

But as soon as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Country accounted fortunate; he gave the Signal of battel: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did sit upon the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging upon them without any fear of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greek Army that was in march, being revoked by Pausanias, came in space to succour the Lacedæmonians: only that part of the Army which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive unto the place of the great battel, because the Thebians, and other Greeks confederated with the Persians, gave them check by the way. Nevertheless, the Spartans, with other their assistants, did so well acquit themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slain in the field; the rest fled into the Camp, which they had fortified with wooden Walls, and there defended themselves with such courage, as desperate necessity enforced them unto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedæmonians were not acquainted with the manner of assaulting Fortresses, and Walls. In the mean time the Athenians having found strong opposition of the Thebians and Thessalians, did with much labour and courage obtain victory, which having not long pursued, they came to help the Lacedæmonians; whom they found warily busied in assailing the Camp, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves undertook it, and in short space forced a passage thorow the Wall; at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greeks entered with such fury, and just desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand, they are said not to have left three thousand alive, excepting those who fled away with Artabazus, when as the Persian Army fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especial cause of it was the foolish retreat, or rather flight into the Camp. For, though it were so, that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who cast themselves into it greater than any of the Assistants; yet they being of several Nations and Languages, and having lost their General, with other principal Commanders, it was impossible that they in such a terror and astonishment should make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemy-Country, against an Army of men, far more valiant than themselves, and enlisted with present victory. Therefore the same Wall, which for a few hours had preferred their lives, by holding out the enemy, did now impale them, and leave them to the slaughtering fury of unpitiful Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Thessaly, and other Countries in his way, that he was sent by Mardonius upon some piece of service: For he well knew, that they understood any thing of that great difficulty, all places would have been hostile unto him, and fought with his ruine to purchase favour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble, were left behind and lost, he came to Byzantium, whence he shipped his men over into Asia. Such was the end of the vain-glorious Expedition, undertaken by Xerxes against the Greeks, upon hope of Honour, and Conquest; though sorting otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had foreseen, and rather worse, forasmuch as it began the quarrel, which never ended before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greeks, despised and fought to have been brought into slavery. Hereby it may seem, that the vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himself, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subversion of the Persian Monarchy by the Greeks, who thus provoked, entered into greater consideration of their own strength, and the weakness of their Enemies.

The Battel of Mycale; with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning: and examples of the like.

THE same day on which the Battel was fought at Plataea, there was another Battel fought at Mycale, a Promontory, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian Fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Albanian, Admirals of the Greek Navy, at the request of some Islanders and Ionians, did fall into those parts, to deliver the Sami-ans, and procure the Ionians to revolt from the Persian. Xerxes himself at this time lay at Sardis, a City in Lydia, not far from the Sea-side, having left threecore thousand under the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ion-ia, and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Ar-tayntes, and Ithramites, Admirals of the Persian Fleet, understood that the Greeks bent their course towards them, they did forth-with draw their ships aground, forti-fying with Palisadoes, and otherwise, as much ground as was needfull for the encamping of all their Land and Sea-forces. Leutychides at his arrival, perceiving that they meant to keep within their strength, and resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his Gally close aboard the shore, and called upon the Ionians (who more for fear, than good will, were encamped among the Persians) ex-horting them in the Greek tongue to remem-ber liberty, and use the fair occasion which they now had to recover it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Euboea, trusting that either these perswa-sions would prevail, or, if the Persians did happen to understand them, that it would breed some jealousy in them, causing them to fight in fear of their own companions. It need not seem strange, that this very same stratagem, which little or nothing availed Themistocles, did now very happily succeed. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficulty, to persuade those Inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now in his declining estate, gave a willing ear to the sweet sound of liberty. The Persians like-wise, who in their former bravery, little re-garded, and less feared, any treason to be contrived by their subjects, were now so wary, that from the Sami-ans which were amongst them, they took away their arms; the Milefians, whom they did suspect; but would not seem to mistrust, they placed far from them, as it were for defence of the straight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milefians did best of all others know those places. But these devices little availed them. For the Sami-ans perceiving that they were held as Traitors, took courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold upon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Pers-ians manfully within the Camp; which ex-amples the Ionians presently followed, be-ing very glad to have found some that durst begin. It is said, that while the Greeks were yet in a march toward the Enemies Camp, a ramour suddenly ran in the Army, that Mardonius was overthrown in Greece, which (though perhaps it was given out by the Captains to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the Battel of Plataea was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the same day.

The like report of that great Battel, wherein Paulus Amilius overthrew Perseus the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in four dayes, as Ætius with others do record. And Plutarch hath many other ex-amples of this kind. As that of the Battel by the River Sagra in Italy, which was heard of, the same day in Poloponnefus. That of the Battel against the Tarquinians; and the Latins, presently noised at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebel to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Anto-nius being Lieutenant of the higher Germa-ny, had corrupted his Army with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make him-self Emperour; which news much troubling the City of Rome, with fear of a dangerous War, it was suddenly reported, that Anto-nius was slain, and his Army defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publick joy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquiry was made, and the Author of these tydings could not be found, the Emperour Domitian betook himself to his journey against the Rebel; and being now with his Army in march, he received ad-vertisement by Post, of the Victory obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon re-membring the rumour noised before in Rome, of the self-same victory, he found that the report and victory were born upon one day, though twenty thousand furlongs (which make above five and twenty hun-dred miles) asunder. It is truly said of Plu-tarch, that this last example gives credit un-to many the like. And indeed it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgery, or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not be found

Of the barbarous qualities of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian affairs to mat-ters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Xerxes lay at Sardis, not far from the place of this Battel; but little mind had he to revenge either this, or other his great losses, being wholly given over to the love of his Brothers Wife: with whom he could not prevail by intreaty, nor would obtain his desire by force. Because he respected much his Brother her Hus-band, he thought it best to make a match between his own Son Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to find occasion of such familiarity as might work out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastity of the Mother did still reject him, or the beauty of the Daughter allure him, he soon after fell in love with his own Sons Wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to govern him-self in peace, as to guide his Army in war. This young Lady having once desired the King to give her the Garment which he then wore, being wrought by his own Wife, caused the Queen thereby to perceive her Husbands conversation with her, which she imputed not so much to the beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon she conceived extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royal Feast, wherein the custom was, that the King should grant their request, she craved, that the Wife of Allexes, her Hus-bands Brother, the young Ladies Mother, might be given into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either have reform-ed the abuse of such a custom, or have delu-ded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatening her self with the like, to what o-ver he should inflict upon the innocent La-dy, granted the request; and sending for his Brother, perswaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seems, that he understood how villainously that poor Lady should be intreated, whom he knew to be virtuous, and whom himself had loved. Allexes refused to put her away; alledging his own love, her deserting, and their com-mon children, one of which was married to the Kings Son, as reasons important to move him to keep her. But in most wicked man-ner Xerxes reviled him, saying, That he now should neither keep the Wife which he had, nor have his Daughter whom he had found (as happens in dreams among many thousand vain and frivolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit we may find, that God him-self doth sometimes use to terrify those who presume upon their own strength, by these light means of tumultuous noises: as he raised the siege of Samarita, by causing a sound of Hornes and Chariots to affright the Ara-mites; and as he threatened Senacherib, saying, Behold, I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a noise, and return to his own Land. Wherefore it may well have been true, that God was pleased by such means as this, to animate the Greeks; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heavy hearts, being in great fear, lest their own adventure should by no means fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their own Country of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius, whilest they went wandering to seek out Enemies a far off upon the coast of Asia. But, the same of the Battel fought at Plataea being noised among them, every man desired that his own valour in the present fight, might be some help to work out the full deliverance of Greece. In this alacrity of spirit, they divided themselves into two Battalions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plain, directly towards the Enemies Camps; the Lacedæmonians conducted the other, by the Mountains and straight passages, to win the higher ground. The Athenians did first set upon the Camp (ere the Lacedæmonians could arrive on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did so forcibly assault it, that they brake way thorow the Palisadoes and Gabions, and made themselves Masters of the place, slaying all that could not save them-selves by flight. In this fight the Sami-ans did good service, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milefians, who upon the like jea-lousie, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the passages, did now (as if they had been sent of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the (word as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except very few, that fled through by-paths. The Lacedæmonians that day did little service, for the business was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke such companies as retired in whole troops; making them flee dispersed in very much disorder, whereby the Milefians were enabled to do the greater execution upon them. This was the last fight of that huge Army levied against Greece, which was now utterly broken, and had no means left to make offensive War.

promised unto him. Mafftes was much grieved with these words, but much more, when returned home, he found his Wife most butcherly mangled by the Queen Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Ears, and Tongue to be cut off; and her Breasts in like manner, which were cast unto Dogs. Mafftes enraged with this villany, took his way with his children, and some friends, towards Babrie, of which Province he was Governour, intending to rebel and avenge himself: But Xerxes understanding his purpose, caused an Army to be levied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the sword. Such was the Tyrannical condition of the Perſian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is joyned with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much virtue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his overthrow, and lying upon the ground, said, That he doubted, whether in regard of his virtue, he should again erect it; or, for the mischief done by him to Greece, should let it lie. But surely, whatsoever his other good qualities were, he was foolish, and was a coward, and consequently mercilefs.

Therefore we may firmly believe, that the virtue of Cyrus was very great, upon which the foundation of the Perſian Empire was so surely laid, that all the wickedness and vanities of Xerxes, and other worse Princes, could not overthrow it, until it was broken by a virtue almost equal to that which did establish it. In wars against the Egyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had been, very good; but against the general estate of Greece, neither he, or any of his posterity, did ever make offensive war, but received many losses in Asia, to which the last at Mycalé served but as an introductiōn; teaching the Greeks, and especially the Athenians, that the Perſian was no better Souldier at his own doors, than in a foreign Country: whereof good trial was made forth-with, and much better proof as soon as the affairs of *Athen*s were quietly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the History of Greece, taking in the matters of Perſia, as also the estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Perſian estate continued in her greatness, many ages following, in such wise, that the known parts of the world had no other Kingdom, representing the Majesty of a great Empire.

But this greatness depended only upon the riches and power that had formerly been acquired, yielding few actions, or none, that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxury, wherewith both it, and all, or the most of Empires that ever were, have been enervated, made unwieldy, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry swords of poor and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to pass, that Xerxes and his successors were faine to defend their Crowns with money & base policies; very seldom or never (unless it were with great advantage) daring to adventure the trial of plain battle with that little Nation of Greece; which would soon have ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not private malice and jealousy urged every City to envy the height of her neighbours walls, and thereby diverted the swords of the Greeks into their own bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better have continued, to hew out the way of Conquest, on the side of Asia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian War, to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

How Athens was re-built and fortified.

AFTER that the Medes and Perſians had received their last blow, and were utterly beaten at Mycalé: Lentichydes, who then commanded the Græcian Army, leaving the pursuit of the War to the Athenians, assisted by the revolted Ionians, returned with the Lacedæmonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta, and

and other places, out of which they had been leaved. The Athenians in the mean while besieged Sestos, a City on the strait of the Helleſpont, between which and Abydos, Xerxes had lately fastened his Bridge of Boats: where the Inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greeks, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Helleſpont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and having left their wives and children, since the invasion of Attica, and the abandoning of the Athenians, in divers Islands, and at Træzen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their own places.

And though the most part of all their houses in *Athen*s were burnt and broken down, and the walls of the City over-turned, yet they resolved first on their common defence, and to fortify their City, before they cared to cover themselves, their wives and children, with any private buildings. Whereof the Lacedæmonians being advertised, and milking the fortifying of *Athen*s, both in respect that their own City of Sparta was unwall'd, as also because the Athenians were grown more powerful by Sea, than either themselves, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any private dislike or jealousy, but pretending, that if the Perſians should return to invade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would serve to receive their enemies, and to be made a Seat for the War, as Thebes had lately been. To this the Athenians promised to give them satisfaction by their own Embassadors very speedily. But being resolved to go on with their works, by the advice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedæmonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raised their walls to that height, as they cared not for their dislikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gain time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedæmon, giving him for excuse, that he could not deliver the Athenians resolutions, till the arrival of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedæmonians expectation being converted into jealousy (for by the arrival of divers persons out of Attica, they were told for certain, That the walls of *Athen*s were speedily grown up beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to believe reports and vain rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their own trusty Citizens to

*Athen*s, from whose relation they might resolve themselves, and determine accordingly. Which request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his own, by whom he advised the Athenians, first to entertain the Lacedæmonians with some such discourse as might retain them a few days, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himself, and the other, Athenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their liberty also to return. Which done, and being also assured by his associates and Aristides, that *Athen*s was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedæmonians know, That it was true that the walls of *Athen*s were now raised to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their City; praying the Lacedæmonians to believe, That whensoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such as right well understood what appertained to a Common-weal and their own safety, without direction and advice from any other: That they had in the War of Xerxes abandoned their City, and committed themselves to the wooden Walls of their Ships, from the resolutions of their own counsels and courage, and not thereto taught or persuaded by others: and finally, in all that perilous War against the Perſians, they found their own judgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or less fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Common-weal among the Greeks. And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Matters and Judges of their own affairs, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confederated within Greece should be left open, or else that the Walls of *Athen*s should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedæmonians finding the time unfit for quarrel, dissembled their dislike, both of the fortifying of *Athen*s, and of the divisions; and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and received back from them their own Embassadors.

The Walls of *Athen*s finished, they also fortified the Port Pyræus, by which they might under covert embark themselves upon all occasions.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatness, and prosperous War made by that State upon the Persian.

THE Athenians having settled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the War against the Persians, to which the Lacedæmonians added other twenty, and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sail for Cyprus, under the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedæmonian; where, after their landing having posited themselves of many principal places, they embarked the Army again, and took land in Thrace, recovering from the Persians by force the City Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behaving himself more like a Tyrant than a Captain, especially towards the Ionians lately revolted from Xerxes, was called back by the Council of Lacedæmon, and not only accused of many insolent behaviours, but of Intelligence with the Athers, and Treason against his Country. In his stead they employed Doreas, who either gave the same cause of offence, or else the Athenians, who affected the first commandment in that War, practised the Souldiers to complain; though indeed the wife and virtuous behaviour of Aristides, General of the Athenian forces, a man of rare and incomparable sincerity, had been able to make a good Commander seem ill in comparison of himself; and therefore was much more available, in rendering those detested, whose vices afforded little matter of excuse. Howsoever it were, the Lacedæmonians being no less wearied of the War, than the Athenians were eager to pursue it, the one obtained their ease, and the other the execution and honour which they desired: for all the Greeks (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subjected themselves to the commandment of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatness in that present age, and of their ruin in the next succeeding. For the charge of the War being now committed unto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities; they appointed Receivers and Treasurers, and began to levy money, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the general defence of Greece; and for the recovering of those places on Europe side, in Asia the Isles, and the Islands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was ever paid by the Greeks) amounted to four hundred and three score Talents, which was raised easily by the honest care of that just man Aristides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselves, and no one man found occasion to complain of him. But as the virtue of Aristides, and other worthy Citizens, brought unto the Athenians great commodity; so the desire which they conceived of encreasing their commodity, corrupted their virtue, and robbing them of the general love, which had made them powerful, abandoned their City to the defence of her treasure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere these four hundred and three score Talents were raised to fix hundred; nor long after that, ere their covetous tyranny had converted their followers into slaves, and extorted from them yearly thirteen hundred Talents. The Isle of Delos was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these sums were laid up, and where, at the general Assembly, the Captains of those forces, sent by the confederates, were for form sake called to consultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger by Sea than all Greece besides, had locked up the common treasure in an Island, under their own protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The general Commander in this War was Cimon, the son of Miltiades, who first took Eionia, upon the River Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mastered the Caristii, and brought into servitude the Naxii, contrary to the form of the confederacy: So did the other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their contribution, or disobeyed their commandments; taking upon them and usurping a kind of sovereign authority over the rest; which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be resisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, weary of the War in their own persons, and given up altogether to their ease, made choice rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of War, or in Ships; leaving the provision of both to the Athenians. Herby the one grew weak in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Wars; the other greatly strengthened their Navy and their experiences, being always armed and employed in honourable services, at the cost of those, who having lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money, levied upon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians, at

§. III.

The death of Xerxes by the treason of Artabanus.

As if these losses, which could not easily have been repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such, as gave just cause to the Persians of seeking peace upon any terms not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the Uncle of Xerxes, perceiving, that the King his Master did easily take small occasions to shed the blood of such, as in kindred or place were near unto him, began to repose his hope of Safety in remaining faithful, than of obtaining the Sovereignty, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his cruelty, and despised for his cowardice and misfortunes. Having conceived this Treason, he found means to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himself had been innocent) he accused Darius the Son of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickedness he got the Kingdom, and held it seven months; or whether, intending the like evil to Artaxerxes the son of Xerxes, he was by him prevented and surprised, were hard to affirm any certainty. But all Writers agree upon this, That taken he was, and with his whole family put to death by extremest torments, according to the sentence whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verse;

Deseruit pede pena claudo.*

Seldom the villain, though much haste he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance fails to overtake.

§. IV.

The banishment of Themistocles: his flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Persia; and his death.

Artaxerxes being established in his Kingdom, and having so compounded with the Athenians, as the present necessity of his affairs required, began to conceive new hopes of better fortune against the Greeks, than he or his predecessors had ever hitherto found. For the people of Athena, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their own merit in that service, that they not only thought it for themselves to become the Commanders over many Towns and Islands of the Greeks, but even within their own walls, they would admit none other form of Government at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded upon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was given. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admiral scouring the Asiatick Seas, took in the City of Phaselis; which having formerly pretended neutrality, and refused to relieve, or any way assist the Greeks, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contribution.

From thence he set sail for the River Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Persian Fleet rode, being of six hundred sail, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fifty, and having a great Land-Army, encamped upon the shoar; all which forces having been provided for advancing the Kings affairs in Greece, were utterly defeated in one day, and two hundred ships taken by the Athenians; the rest being broken to pieces, or sunk, ere ever they had swum in the Greekish Seas. Cimon having in one day obtained two great Victories, the one by Sea, and the other by Land, was very soon presented with a third. For four score sail of Phoenicians (who were the best of all Sea-men, under the Persian command) thinking to have joyned themselves with the Fleet before destroyed, arrived upon the same Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and fearing nothing less than what ensued. Upon the first notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-land, called Hydra, did so amaze them, that they only sought to run themselves on ground; by which mean preserving few of their men, they lost all their ships. These losses did so break the courage of the Persians, that omitting all hope of prevailing upon Greece, he condescended to whatsoever Articles the Athenians to propound, granting liberty unto all the Greeks inhabiting Asia; and further covenanting, That none of his ships of War should sail to the Westward of the Isles, called Cyanea and Chelidonia.

This was the most honourable peace that ever the Greeks made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any War that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till such time as under Alexander, they overthrew the Empire of Persia; in which War, few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but served altogether under the Macedonians.

§. V.

Of other Wars made by the Athenians for the most part with good success, about the same time.

Notwithstanding these overthrows in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home Wars waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedemonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten near unto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, so they obtained two great victories soon after, the one over the Peloponnesians, near unto Cecryphalia; the other over the Æginets, near unto Ægina, where they sunk and carried away three score and ten Gallies of their enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the sudden, and besieged Ægina, from whence they could not be moved, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Ægæra; where, after a great fight with equal loss, the Corinthians, when they returned again to set up their Trochæ, as Victors in the former battel, were utterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons, and Megarians, to their great loss and dishonour.

Again, as the Athenians were discomfited near to Tangra, by the Lacedemonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians (at which time the Thessalian horsemen turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about three score days after, the Athenians entered Ævotia under the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they won Phocis on the gulf of Oetæus, and evened the walls of Tenagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Ægina to render upon most base conditions; as to beat down the walls of their City, and to give them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these victories, they sackt and spoiled many places upon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedemonians, wan upon the Corinthians, and overthrew the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the undertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those six years, that a part of their forces made War in Egypt. In the end whereof they attempted Theffaly, perswaded thereunto by Orestes, but were resisted by the King Pharlaus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicionia, and had victory over those that resisted; after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for five years, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships; but they were again allured by Ameyrius one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marsh and Woody parts of Egypt from the Persians, to whom they sent sixty of their ships. The rest of their Army failing in their enterprise at Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the Island, incouraged a fleet of the Phœnicians and Cilicians, over both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe which were sent into Egypt.

§. VI.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus, that he was Ahasuerus the Husband of Queen Hester.

These Egyptian troubles being ended, the reign of Artaxerxes continued peaceable: whereof the length is by some restrained unto twenty years, but the more and better Authors give him forty, some allow unto him four and forty. He was a Prince of much humanity, and noted for many examples of gentleness. His favour was exceeding great to the Jews; as appeareth by the Histories of Ezdras and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To prove that this was the King who gave countenance and ayd to that great work of building the Temple, it were a needless travel; considering that all the late Divines have taken very much pains to shew that those two Prophets were licensed by him, and succoured in that building, in such sort as appears in their writings.

This was likewise that King Ahasuerus who married Hester. Whereof if it be needfull to give proof, it may suffice, that Ahasuerus lived in Susa, reigning from India to Æthiopia, and therefore must have been a Persian; That he lived in peace, as appears by the circumstances of the History, and used the counsell of the seven Princes, the authority of which Princes began under Darius the son of Hystaspes; wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyses.

The continual Wars which exercised King Darius the son of Hystaspes, together with the certainty of his marriages with sundry sundry wives, from none of whom he was divorced, but left his first wife Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, alive in great honour, she being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King, do manifestly prove that Hester was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew. That at the perswasion of Mardochæus, Jochabim the High Priest the son of Jesha, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in memory of that deliverance. Now the time of Jochabim was in the reign of Artaxerxes; at the coming of Ezdras and Nehemias; Jesha his father dying about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of wars with other his furious and tragical loves wherewith Xerxes did consume such little time as he had free from war, are enough to prove, that the story of Hester pertained not unto the time of Xerxes, who lived but one and twenty years, whereas the two and thirtieth of Ahasuerus or Artaxerxes is expressed by Nehemias. Again, it is well known that Xerxes in the seventh year of his reign (wherein this marriage must have been celebrated) came not near to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to prove that none of them could be Ahasuerus, it is enough to say, that Mardochæus having been carried from Hierusalem captive, with Jechonia, by Nabuchadnezzar, was unlikely to have lived until their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he lived in Susa, reigned from India to Æthiopia, lived in peace, was contemporary with Jochabim the high Priest, and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Egyptians in that seventh year of his reign; which good fortune might well give occasion to such a Royal Feast, as is described in the beginning of Hester. This is the sum of the arguments, brought to prove the age of Hester's story by the learned and diligent Krentzheimius, who adds the authorities of Josaphus, affirming the same, and of Philo giving to Mardochæus eighteen years more than Isaac the Patriarch lived, namely, one hundred four score and eighteen years in all, which expire in the five and thirtieth year of this Artaxerxes, if we suppose him to have been carried away captive, being a Boy of ten years old.

§. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponnesiān War.

But it is fit that we now return to the Affairs of the Greeks, who from this time forward, more vehemently prosecuting their civil wars, suffered the Persians for many ages to rest in peace: this Egyptian Expedition being come to nought. Soon after this, the Lacedemonians undertook the war called Sacred, recovered the Temple and Isle of Delfos, and delivered both to the Inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the same, and gave it in charge to the Phocians. In the mean while the banished Ævotians re-entered their own Land, & mastered two of their own Towns posselt by the Athenians, which they soon recovered again from them; but in their return towards Athens, the Ævotians, Eubœians, and Loerians (Nations opprest by the Athenians) set upon them with such resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all slain or taken, whereby the Ævotians recovered their former liberty, returning to the Athenians their prisoners. The Islanders of Eubœa took such courage upon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was advertised that the Megarians (who first left the Lacedemonians, and submitted themselves to Athens) being now weary of their yoke, had slain the Athenians Garrisons, and joyned themselves with the Corinthians, Sycionians, and Epidaurians. These news hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speed; but ere he could recover Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Plistonax the son of Pansanius, had invaded it, pillaged and burnt many parts thereof, after whose return Pericles went on with his first intent, and recovered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yielded to deliver up all the places which they held in the Countrey of Peloponnesus: and this truce was made for thirty years.

After six of these years were expired, the Athenians (favouring the Mylefians against the Samiens) invaded Samos by Pericles; and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea & Land, the Citizens were forced to yield up themselves upon most lamentable conditions: Namely, to deliver up all their ships, to break down their own walls, to pay the charge of the war, and to restore whatsoever had been taken by themselves, or by their practice, from the Athenians. In the neck of which, followed that long and cruel

Peloponnesian War, whereof I have gathered this Brief following: the same contention taking beginning fifty years after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no City thereof, which either in the beginning of this war, or in the continuance of it, was not drawn into the quarrell; I hold it convenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Country at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens and Sparta, upon which all the rest had most dependence.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian War.

Upon what terms the two principal Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood at the beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

Greece was never united under the Government of any one Prince or Estate, untill Philip of Macedonia, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to Union and League against the Persians, whereof they were Captains, than into any absolute subjection. For every Estate held their own, and were governed by Laws, far different, and by their own Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yield obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their Leaders in the Persian war (deemed the General quarrel of Greece) and took the profit and honour of the victory, to their own use and increase of greatness. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia, did so far enlarge their authority, that all Greece was by them brought under such obedience, as differed little from servitude, very few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with arms, and sometimes with gifts, preserve their liberty: of whom the Lacedaemonians and Athenians were chief; which two people deserved best the plague of tyranny, having first given occasion thereunto by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Country by perpetual War. For, untill these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing every State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gave beginning to the Peloponnesian War (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had overmastered all, forasmuch as every conclusion of one war afforded henceforth matter of some new distraction of the whole Country) the wars, commenced between one City of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controversies were soon decided, either by the authority of the Amphictiones, who were the general Council of Greece, or by the power of the Lacedaemonians, whose aid was commonly held as good as the assurance of victory.

These Lacedaemonians had lived about four hundred years under one form of Government when the Peloponnesian War began. Their education was only to practise feats of Arms; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equal to very great numbers of any other people. They were poor, and cared not much for wealth; every one had an equal portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintain him in such manner as they used. For bravery they had none, and curious building or apparel they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinary meals being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They used Money of Iron, whereof they could not be covetous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived Utopian-like, save that they used no other occupation than War, placing all their felicity in the glory of their valour. Hereby it came to pass that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they used mercenary Souldiers in their wars, and exacted great tribute of their Subjects, which were for the most part Islanders compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in form of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions natural, the difference between

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into War.

twen these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, sudden in their conclusions, and as hasty in the execution. The Lacedaemonians very slow in their deliberations, full of gravity, but very resolute, and such as would in cold blood perform what the Athenians did usually in flagrant. Whereby it came to pass, that the Lacedaemonians had all the Estates of Greece depending upon them, as on men firm and assured, that fought honour, and not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in freight subjection. But the Signiory of the Athenians was nothing large, untill such time as the Persian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending only a quarrel to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiving well, that the Town of Athens could not be defended against his great Army of seventeen hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth upon a Navy, and assisted by the other Greeks overthrew the Fleet of Xerxes, whose Land forces were soon after discomited by them, and the Greeks, who all served under conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in Fleet, reduced all the Islands of the Greekish Seas under their obedience; imposing upon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of War against the Persians; though indeed they employed their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Islands and Haven-Towns of their Country-men, as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedaemonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in Expeditions to be made far from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much jealousy, and were very apt to quarrel with them; but much more willing to breed contention between them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would have oppressed the Plataeans, when they of Plataea repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aid, than this advice, That they should seek help at Athens. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious War with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did only serve to encrease their honour and puissance.

Nevertheless, many Estates of Greece were very ill-affected to Athens, because that City grew very insolent upon sudden prosperity, and, maintaining the weaker Towns against the stronger, incroached space upon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much enraged, because the people of the Island Corcyra, their Colony which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their Fleet by adjoining that of Corcyra unto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby defeated of that revenge, which else they would have taken. Now, howsoever it were so, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed upon among the Greeks, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much ado) they concluded to redress by war the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore, seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certain offences committed against the gods; whereto having for answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta, they began to deal plainly, and required that the people of some Towns, oppressed by the State of Athens, should be set at liberty; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reversed. This last point they so earnestly press, that if they might obtain it, they promised to abstain from their purpose of making War.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by seeming to have obtained somewhat, they might preserve their reputation without entering into a War, which threatened them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to undergo.

But the Athenians would yield to nothings; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice how far they were from fear of any other City. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needful to the War; wherein the Lacedaemonians were Superior, both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece, and having the general favour, as men that pretended to set at liberty such as were oppressed; but the Athenians did as far exceed them in all provisions of money, shipping, engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held, and afterward found of greater use in such need, than the willing readiness of friends, who soon grow weary, and are not easily assembled.

S. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

THE first and second years Expedition was very grievous to the City of Athens. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut down, the Country people driven to fly, with Wives, Children, and Cattel into the Town; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the City, such as before they had never felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the revolt of the Mytilenians, in the Isle of Lesbos, and the siege of Plataea their confederated City, which they durst not adventure to raise, besides some small overthrows received. The Lacedaemonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Country of Attica, and therein abide, until victuals began to fail, wasting and destroying all things round about. The Governours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their enemies: but used to send a Fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their enemies, whil实现 they were making war in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wan the Town of Plataea, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that War the Lacedaemonians began to perceive how unfit they were to deal with such enemies. For after that Attica was thoroughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to do any offence equal to such harm as they themselves might, and did, receive. The Confederates began to set forward very slowly in their Expeditions into Attica; perceiving well that Athens was plentifully relieved with all necessities, which came by the Sea from the Islands that were subject unto that Estate; and therefore these Invaders took but small pleasure in beholding the Walls of that mighty City, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a pattern of the calamities with which their own Territory was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they began to set their care to build a strong Navy, wherein they had little good success, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skilfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

S. IV.

Of the great loss which the Spartans received at Pylos.

AMONG other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea, they received at Pylos a very fore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A Fleet of Athenian ships bound for Corcyra, waiting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the half-Isle of Peloponnesus, was by contrary winds detained at Pylos, which is a ragged Promontory, joyning to the Main, by a strange neck of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Island of less than two miles compass, and within that a Creek, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being born off by the head-Land and Isle. This Promontory the Athenians fortified, as well as in haste they might; and what was wanting in their artificial fortification, was supplied by the natural strength and site of the place. By holding this piece of ground, and haven, they in reason expected many advantages against their enemies. For the Country adjoining was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient times had held very strong and cruel war with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in straight subjection; yet was not the old hatred so extinguished, that by the near neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not be revived. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedaemonians, and as many of their bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repair to Pylos, and from thence make daily incursions into Laconia, which was not far off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this haven, lying almost in the mid-way between them and Corcyra, make them able to surround all Peloponnesus, and waste it at their pleasure. The news of these doings at Pylos drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entered a few days before with their whole Army: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Navy to recover this piece, which how bad a neighbour it might prove in time, they well fore-saw, little fearing the grievous loss at hand, which they there in few days received. For when they in vain made a general assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land, finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence, they occupied the haven, placing four hundred and twenty choice men, all of them Citizens of Sparta, in the Island before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channel that leads into the Port; but so narrow, that only two ships in front could enter between the Isle and Pylos; likewise but seven or eight ships could enter at once by the further channel, between the Island and the Main. Having thus taken order to fluit up this new Town by Sea, they sent part of their Fleet to fetch wood, and other stuff, wherewith to fortify round about, and block up the piece on all sides. But in the mean season the Athenian Fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylos, returned thither, and with great courage entering the haven, did break and sink many of their enemies vessels; took five, and so enforced the residue to run themselves aground.

Now was the Town secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Island as good as lost. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the Camp (as was their custom in great dangers) to advise what were best for the publick safety; who when they did perceive that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Isle, than by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the mean while with the Captains at Pylos. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedaemonians should deliver up all the ships which were in the Coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Town, nor the Athenians against the Camp; That a certain quantity of Bread, Wine, and Fleth, should be daily carried into the Isle, but that no ships should pass into the Island secretly: That the Athenians should carry the Lacedaemonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and should bring them back, at whose return the truce should end, which if in the mean time it were broken in any one point, should be held utterly void in all; That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The Embassadors coming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themselves had begun the War, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedaemonians did sue to them for peace, advising them to make an end of War, whilst with such reputation they might. But they found all contrary to their expectation: For instead of concluding upon even terms, or desiring of meet recompence for loss sustained, the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be restored to them, which had been taken from them by the Lacedaemonians long before this War began, refusing likewise to continue the treaty of peace, unless the Spartans which were in the Isle, were first rendered unto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect; at which time the truce being ended, it was desired from the Athenian Captains, that they should, according to their Covenant, restore the ships which had been put into their hands. Whereunto answer was made, that the condition of the truce was, that if any one Article were broken, all should be held void; now (said the Athenians) ye have assaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are we acquitted of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meer shifts; yet profit so far overweighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedaemonians driven to use many hard means, for conveyance of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slain. Whether fearing the death of these men, or withheld by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell upon them, the Lacedaemonians were so far from wasting Attica, that they suffered their own Country to be continually over-run, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their Coast, and by those which issued out of Pylos; which became the Rendezvous of all that were ill-affected unto them.

How the Lacedaemonians hardly, and to their great disadvantage, obtained a Peace that was not well kept.

THUS therefore they endeavoured greatly to obtain peace; which the Athenians would not hearken unto. For they were so puffed up with continuance of good success, that having sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold up a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilian quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their bands returned without either gain gain or loss, they banished the Captains, as if it had been merely through their default, that the Isle of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it self, no whit inferior unto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their over-weening much abated shortly after, by some disalters received, especially in Thrace, where, in a battel which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon and Brasidas, Generals of the Athenian and Lacedæmonian forces, were both slain; which two had most been adversaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderations; so the Lacedæmonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Navy which they had received at Egins, were fain to proceed lamely in the War, against such as, through commodity of their good fleet, had all advantage that could be found in expedition, were fervently desirous to conclude the business, ere Fortune by any new favour should revive the infolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a consideration of their present estate, that urged them to bring the treaty of peace to a good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging over their heads, and ready to fall on them, which unless they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to avoid. The estate of Argos, which had ancient enmity with them, was now after a truce of thirty years well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by joining with those who alone found them work enough. Argos was a rich and strong City, which though inferior to Sparta in valour, yet was not so unwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedæmonians could ever far prevail upon it, when they had little else to do.

This was a thing that in the beginning of this War had not been regarded. For it was then thought that by wailing the Territory of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrel should easily and in short time have been ended, whereby not only the Athenians should have been brought to good order, but the Corinthians, and others, for whose sake the War was undertaken, have been so firmly knit to the Lacedæmonians, that they should for love of them have abandoned the Argives to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready money, and means to raise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong fleet, from any great harm that the Peloponnesians, wanting wherewith to maintain a Navy, could do unto them; yea, as Masters of the Sea, to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither War nor peace; their daily travels, and many losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians were glad to use the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a final peace, which with much ado they procured, as seemed equal and easie; but was indeed impossible to be performed, and therefore all their travel was little effectual.

The restitution of prisoners and places taken being agreed upon, it fell out by lot, that the Lacedæmonians should restore first. These had won more Towns upon the Continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had won, they had not won absolutely. For they had restored some Towns to such of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; some, and those the most, they had set at liberty (as reason required) which had opened their gates unto them as to their friends and deliverers, and not compelled them to break in as enemies. Now concerning the Towns which were not in their own hands, but had been rendred unto their Confederates, the Spartans found means to give some satisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retain others, which they had gotten in the War; as for the rest, they promised more than afterwards they could perform. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to hear of being abandoned, neither would they by any means yield themselves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by revolting, notwithstanding whatsoever Articles were drawn, and concluded, for their security, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those things which on their part were required; so that restoring only the prisoners which they had, they deferred the rest, untill such time as they might receive the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrel, the Lacedæmonians entred into a more streight alliance with the Athenians, making a league offensive and defensive with them. Hereunto they were moved by the backwardness of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to have been

peace at their hands, as soon as things were once compounded between Athens and Sparta, did shew themselves plainly unwilling to give ear to any such motion. Thinking therefore, that, by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they should make lure work, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound unto them by well-deferving in the late War, or found so troublesome, that their enmity (if perhaps they durst let it appear) was little worse than friendship. It bred great jealousies in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive such a conjunction between two so powerful Signiories; especially one clause threatening every one, that was any thing apt to fear, with a secret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of subduing the whole Country, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For, besides the other Articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual consent add new conditions, or alter the old at their own pleasures. This impulsion wrought so strongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had born to the Athenians their professed enemies, was violently thrown upon the Lacedæmonians their unjust friends: whereby it came to pass, that they who lately had born chief sway in Greece, might have been abandoned to the discretion of their enemies, as already in effect they were, had the enemies wisely used the advantage.

§. VI.

Of the negotiations and practices held between many States of Greece, by occasion of the Peace that was concluded.

THE admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as unresistible, and able to make way through all impediments, had been so excessive, that when by some sinister accidents, that City was compelled to take and seek peace, upon terms not founding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens usually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was never thought that any Lacedæmonian would have endured to lay down his weapons, and yield himself prisoner, nor that any misfortune should have been so great, as should have drawn that City to relieve it self otherwise than by force of Arms. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especial mark, being overlaid by enemies, in the Island before Pylos, had rather chosen to live in captivity, than to die in fight; and that Pylos it self, sticking as a thorn in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as utterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit down, and seek to refresh it self by dishonourable ease: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceive basely of those men which were virtuous, though unfortunate; but other less Cities joining with these in the same opinion, did cast their eyes upon the rich and great City of Argos, of whose ability to do much, they conceived a strong belief, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish envy is become almost natural in the greater part of mankind. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should have discerned only the virtues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are justly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers, which we know to be wanting in our selves.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moved rather by envy at the greatness of Athens daily encreasing) the Lacedæmonians had entred into the present War. But these Corinthians did only murmur at the peace, alleging as grievances, that some Towns of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans, who during the time of War, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forlake their dependency upon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discover themselves; fear of revenge to come, working more effectually than indignation at things already past. The Argives feeling the gale of prosperous fortune that began to fill their sails, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could stand under; giving for that purpose unto twelve of their Citizens a full and absolute commission to make alliance between them and any free Cities of Greece (Athens and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding every particular business to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all comers; the Mantineans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them, entred into this new confederacy; some incited by private respects, others thinking it the wisest way to do as the most did. What inconvenience might arise unto them by these courses, the Lacedæmonians easily discerned; & therefore sent Embassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischief had been hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a gravity expressing the opinion which they had conceived of their present advantage over Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entered yet into alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gave audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not forsake the alliance which they had long since made with Sparta; and that Reason did as well bind them to hold themselves contented with the peace lately made, as Religion enforced them to continue in their ancient confederacy; forasmuch as it had been agreed between the Spartans and their associates, that the consent of the greater part (which had yielded unto peace with Athens) should bind the lesser number to perform what was concluded, if no Divine impediment withstood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made answer, that the Spartans had first begun to do them open wrong, in concluding the war wherein they had lost many places, without provision of restitution; and that the very clause alleged by the Embassadors, did acquit them from any necessity of subscribing to the late Peace, forasmuch as they had sworn unto those people whom they perfwaded to rebel against Athens, that they would never abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall again into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in Reason and Religion to use all means of upholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oath was no less to be accounted a Divine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindring the performance of things undertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said that they would do as they should find cause. Having dismissed the Embassadors with this answer, they made haste to joyn themselves with Argos, and caused other States to do the like; so that Sparta and Athens were in a manner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also upon the point to have entred into this new confederacy. But as the affections were divers which caused this hasty confluence of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to pass that the friendship it self, such as it was, had much diversity both of sincerity and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians, as the Manti-

means and Eleans; these did firmly betake themselves to the Argives, in whom they knew the same affection to be inveterate: others did only hate the peace concluded; and these would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argives in War, yet rather the Argives in War than the Lacedæmonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like unto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the society of the Argives, as they had done: but the different forms of Government, used in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principal men, than to incur the danger of innovation, by joyning with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This business having ill succeeded, the Corinthians began to bethink themselves of their own danger, who had not so much as any truce with Athens, and yet were unprepared for War. They fought therefore to come to some temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one City that had shewed against them more stomach than force; but gave them to understand, that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claim the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally they granted unto these Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired; but into private confederacy they would not admit them, being an article of the league between them and the Spartans. That the one should not make peace nor War without the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may clearly be seen the great advantage which absolute Lords have, as well in peace as in war, over such as are served by voluntaries. We shall hardly find any Signiory, that hath been so constantly followed as Sparta was by so many States, and some of them little inferior to it self, being all as free: whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsive means gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselves as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed upon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacy, and giving up such places as were agreed upon: of which the Lacedæmonians could do neither the one nor the other. For such Towns as their their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be restored without their consent which had them in present possession; and particularly the Town of Onade, which the Thebans held, could by no means be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof unto the Athenians as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recover Pylus) unless that they would agree to make a private alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were constrained to do, though knowing it to be contrary to the last agreement between them and Athens.

The Lacedæmonians having broken one article of the league made between them & the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not give up the Town of Onade, till first they had utterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was sought to have been excused by the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, who coming to Athens (whither they had sent home all prisoners that had been detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to save the matter; saying, That from henceforth no enemy of Athens should nestle in Onade, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deal with tame fools. For the Athenians told them in plain terms, That of three principal conditions agreed upon in their late League, they had not performed any one; but used such base conclusions as stood not with their honour: having made private alliance with the Thebans; having destroyed a Town that they should have restored; and not having forced their dependants by War, to make good the Covenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that year, in Sparta; & Alcibiades, a powerful young Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the War, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendered to them by Covenant, especially Pylus that had so sorely troubled them. Alcibiades, whose Nobility, riches and favour with the people, made him desire War, as the mean whereby himself might procure some honourable employment; used all means to set the quarrel on foot, whilst the Athenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having rendered ought save their prisoners, and pretence enough to use that advantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed against their wills) had broken all Covenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to perform nothing that the Lacedæmonians should, and might require, until they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all Articles whereto they were bound, even to the utmost point. This was enough to make them sweat, who having already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delivery of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades willing a speedy beginning of open war, fell privily to the Argives, and gave them to understand how fitly the time served for them to associate themselves with Athens, which was enough to give them security against all enemies.

The Argives, upon the first confluence of many Estates unto their society, had embraced great hopes of working wonders as if they should have had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as having ill used it, and thereby leaving their old enemies in case of much contempt and disability. But these sudden apprehensions of vain joy, were suddenly changed into vain fears; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately been conceived of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Corinthians had sought security from Athens; and when a false rumour was noised abroad, Athens, Thebes and Sparta, were come to a full agreement upon all points of difference; then began the Argives to let fall their crests, and sue for peace unto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their gravity, and were not over-hasty to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argives, which were not now consulting how to become the chief of all others, but how to save themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their own Embassadors, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensive and defensive between their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this business the Lacedæmonians knew not what to think: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to prevent it; but to keep the love of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done, than stood with their honour or profit; others held it the wisest way, having done so much, not to stick upon a little more, but rather by giving full satisfaction, to retain the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued than all the rest of Greece. This resolution prevailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who coming to Athens, with full commission to make an end of all controversies, did earnestly labour in the Council-house, to make the truth of things appear, saying; That their Confederacy with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recovery of Panactæ; concerning which Town, or any other business, that it much grieved the Lacedæmonians, to see things fall out in such wise as might give to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters even between them; to which purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might be restored to them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argives might be called off. Favourable audience was given to this proposition, the rather, because they which promised amends, had power to make their words good. But all this fair likelihood of good agreement was dashed on the sudden, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, persuaded them well of his friendship towards their City, and advised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be known to the Commonalty of Athens; lest the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptory and yield to nothing, unless they could draw them to unreasonable conditions. The Embassadors believed him, and fashioned their tale in the assembly of the people, as he had advised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the advantage, which their double dealing afforded, inveighed openly against them, as men of no sincerity; that were come to Athens for no other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthening themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argives and their Adherents to their own alliance, as (contrary to their own Oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, whom a pleasing errand would very hardly have fatished, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill been seconded, with good performance) were now so much incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadors, and the strong persuasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present (so far did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, prevail with them, that the business was put off, until he himself, with other Embassadors, might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

It may also seem a great wonder, how so poor a trick of Alcibiades was able to carry a matter of so great importance, when the Spartan Embassadors might have cast the load upon his own shoulders, by discovering the truth: But the gravity which was usually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindered them (perhaps) from playing their game handomely against so nimble a wit; and they might well have been thought untrusty men, had they professed themselves such as would say and un-say for their most advantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a slow message to deliver at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedæmonians should take the pains to rebuild Panactæ, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebans; letting them understand, that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacy with the Argives, and their adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no mind to forsake the Thebans, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to break out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would do no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seem to have effected nothing) swear a new to keep the Articles of the league between him and Athens. Immediately therefore upon return of the Embassadors, a new league was made between the Athenians, Argives, Mantinians, and Eleans, with very ample provision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were pallied over with silence, yet was it manifest, that the whole intent of this confederacy did bend it self chiefly against them, as in short while after was proved by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill case, who having restored all that they could unto the Athenians, and procured others to do the like, had themselves recovered nothing of their own (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should.

should. But that which did most of all dislike them, was the loss of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late War by misfortunes, than in sundry passages between them and the Athenians: to procure and keep whose Amity, they had left sundry of their own friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwise, the Athenians by the treaty of peace, had recovered the most part of that which they lost in War; all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthened by the access of new Confederates.

How the Peace between Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argives and their fellows had found business wherewith to let the Athenians on work, and make use of this conjunction. For, presuming upon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hostility were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infect each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aid of their several friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Boeotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, began a new to range themselves under the Lacedæmonians, and follow their ensigns. One victory which the Lacedæmonians obtained by their meer valour in a set Battle, near to Mantineæ, against the Argive side, helped well to repair their decayed reputation, though otherwise it yielded them no great profit. The civil dissension arising shortly after within Argos it self, between the principal Citizens, and the Commons, had almost thrown down the whole frame of the new combination. For the chief Citizens getting the upper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so far, as to renounce the Amity of the Athenians in express words, and forced the Mantinians to the like. But in short space of time the multitude prevailing, reversed all this, and having chased away their ambitious Nobility, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Besides these uproars in Peloponnesus, many affairs were made to raise up troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macedon, to the Athenians; whose forces and readiness for execution, prevented some things, revenged other, and required all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrel, and the Lacedæmonians growing weary, they began to be quiet; retaining still that enmity in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discovered in effects, though not yet breaking out into terms of open War.

§. VIII.

The Athenians sending two Fleets to sack Syracusæ, are put to flight, and utterly discomfited.

DURING this intermission of open War, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of subduing Sicily; whither they sent a Fleet so mighty, as never was set forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This Fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessaries to so great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades, Author of that voyage, and one of the Generals of their Fleet, was driven to banish himself, for fear of such judgement, as else he was like to have undergone among the incensed people; partly by the invasion which the Lacedæmonians made upon Attica, whilst the forces of that State were so far from home. Hereunto was added the aid of the King of Persia, who supplied the Peloponnesians with money.

Neither was the success of things in Sicily such, as without help from Athens, could give any likelihood of a good end in that War. For, although in the beginning, the enterprise had so well succeeded, that they besieged Syracuse, the chief City of all the Island, and one of the fairest Towns which the Greeks inhabited, obtaining the better in sundry Battels by Land and Sea; yet when the Town was relieved with strong aid from Peloponnesus, it came to pass that the Athenians were put to the worse on all sides, in such wise, that their Fleet was shut up into the haven of Syracuse, and could not issue out.

As the Athenian affairs went very ill in Sicily, so did they at home stand upon their terms; for that the Lacedæmonians, who had been formerly accustomed to make wearisome yearly journeys into Attica, which having pillaged and foraged, they returned home; did now by counsel of Alcibiades (who seeking revenge upon his own Citizens, was fled unto them) fortify the Town of Decelea, which was near to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily incursions to harry all the Country round about, and sometimes give alarm unto the City it self.

In these extremities, the perverse obstinacy of the Athenians was very strange; who leaving at their backs, & at their own doors, an enemy little less mighty than themselves, did yet send forth another Fleet into Sicily, to invade a people no less puissant, which had never offended them.

It often happens, that a prosperous event makes foolish counsel seem wiser than it was; which came to pass many times among the Athenians, whose vain Conceits Pallas was laid to turn to the best. But where unfound advice, finding bad proof, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be justly blamed for a miserable issue. This second Fleet of the Athenians, which better might have served to convey home the former that was defeated, after some attempts made to small purpose against the Syracuzans, was finally (together with the other part of the Navy, which was there before) quite vanquished, and barr'd up into the haven of Syracuse, whereby the Camp of the Athenians, utterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driven to break up, and fly away by Land; in which flight they were over-taken, routed, and quite overthrown, in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischief well deserved, fell upon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Phidodorus Generals, formerly sent into that Isle, pretending that they had taken money for making peace in Sicily, whereas indeed there was not any means or possibility to have made War. Hereby it came to pass, that Nicias, who had the chief command in this unhappy enterprise, did rather chuse to hazard the ruine of his Country by the loss of that Army, wherein consisted little less than all the power of Athen; than to adventure his own estate, his life; and his honour, upon the tongues of shameless accusers, and the sentence of Judges before his trial resolved to condemn him, by retiring from Syracuse, when wisdom and necessity required it. For (said he) they shall give sentence upon us, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would give ear to any that would speak in our behalf, but altogether hearken to suspicious and vain rumours that shall be brought against us: yea these our soldiers, who now are so desirous to return in safety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man, to do what reason willeth, nor what opinion expecteth; and to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report and censure of others; yet it may be excused; since he had before his eyes the injustice of his people, and had well understood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a president and pattern whereby oppression beginning upon one, is extended as warrantable upon all. Therefore his fear of wrongful condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily have over-mastered; but when afterwards the Army, having no other expectation of safety than the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moon, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to have the Camp break up till seven and twenty daies were past. His timorousness was even as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not have thought that the powers of the Heavens, and the course of Nature would be as unjust as his Athenians; or might portend less evil to the foolish, than to such as did their best. Neither do I think that any Astrologers can alledge this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armies destruction, otherwise than as the folly of men did, by application, turn it to their own confusion. Had C. Cæsar the Roman, he who slew Julius Cæsar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retiring, the broken remainder of Craſſus his Army, defeated by the Parthian Archers, was advised, upon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sun were past the sign of Scorpio; he made answer, that he stood not in such fear of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So adventuring rather to abide the frowning of the Heavens, than the nearer danger of Enemies upon Earth, he made such a safe and honourable retreat, as did both shew his noble resolution, and give a fair example to that good rule,

— Sapientis Dominabitur astris. —

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily works by a concatenation of means, deprives the Governours of understanding, when he intends evil to the Multitude; and that the wickedness of unjust men is the ready mean to weaken the virtue of those who might have done them good.

of the troubles wherinto the State of Athens fell, after the great loss of the Fleet and Army in Sicily.

THE loss of this Army was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accounted a very little less calamity to that Estate, than was the subversion of the walls, when the City about seven years after was taken by Lysander. For now began the subjects of the Athenian Estate to rebel: of whom, some they reduced under their obedience, others held out; some for fear of greater inconvenience were set at liberty promising only to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subjects; others having a kinde of liberty offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect liberty by force. Among these troubles it fell out very unseasonably, that the principal men of Athen, being wearied with the peoples insolency, took upon them to change the form of that Estate, and bring the Government into the hands of a few. To which purpose, conspiring with the Captains which were abroad, they caused them to set up the form of an Aristocracy in the Towns of their Confederates; and in the mean time, some that were most likely to withstand this Innovation, being slain at Athen, the Commonalty were so dismayed, that none durst speak against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but every man was afraid of his neighbour, lest he should be a member of the league. In this general fear the Majesty of Athen was usurped by four hundred men, who observing in shew the ancient form of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded unto the people, and concluded upon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were only such as were first allowed in private among themselves; neither had the Commonalty any other liberty, than only to approve and give consent: for whosoever presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no enquiry made of the murder. By these means were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new authority, which nevertheless endured not long. For the Fleet and Army which then was in the Isle of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the four hundred usurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they revoked Alcibiades out of banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised to the Lacedæmonians, were by Tissaphernes, his Lieutenant, made unprofitable, through the flow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first been very well entertained in Sparta, whilst his service done unto that State, was not grown to be the object of envy. But when it appeared that in Council and good performance he so far excelled all the Lacedæmonians, that all their good success was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principal Citizens weary of his virtue; especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so far yielded her self to the love of this Athenian, that among her inward friends she could not forbear to call her young child by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discovering the Spartan treachery, conveyed himself unto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beauty, sweet conversation, and sound wit, that he soon became the Master of that barbarous Vice-roys affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings Treasures and Forces in those parts. Then began he to advise Tissaphernes, not so far forth to assist the Lacedæmonians, that they should quite overthrow the State of Athen, but rather to help the weaker side, and let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsel he made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the only Favorite of so great a Potentate) he played his own game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Army, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the four hundred) he laboured greatly to reconcile the Soldiers to the Governours; or at least to divert their heat another way, and turn it upon the common Enemy. Some of the four hundred approved his motion, as being weary of the tyranny whereof they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure, & partly for that themselves, being less regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, sought to acquit themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtain peace of the Lacedæmonians, desiring chiefly to maintain both their own authority, and the greatness of their City, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preserve their own power, or safety at least, than the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundry overtures of peace to the Lacedæmonians, desiring to compound in as good terms terms as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted, than the wavering multitude; especially considering that the City of Sparta was governed by an Aristocracy, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All these passages between the four hundred (or the most and chief of them) and the Lacedæmonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the City of Athens, hoping, without any great cause, to repair their losses, was not inclined to make composition; from which upon juster ground the Enemy was much more averse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not unknown abroad) might yield some fair opportunity to the destruction of it self, which in effect (though not then presently) came to pass. And upon this hope King Agis did sometimes bring his forces from Decælea to Athens, where doing no good, he received some small losses. Likewise the Navy of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the City, but seeing no likelihood of success, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained Victories, which in the better fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have been regarded, than in this their decayed estate. Yet it seems, without any disparagement to their wisdom, they should rather have forborn to present unto the City, or to the Countries near adjoining, any terror of the War. For the diligence within the walls might soon have done more good than could be received from the Fleet or Army without, which indeed gave occasion to let the Citizens at unity, though it lasted not very long. The four hundred, by means of these troubles, were fain to resign their authority, which they could not now hold, when the people, having taken arms to repel foreign Enemies, would not lay them down, till they had freed themselves from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of Government a full restitution of the sovereign command unto the people, or whole body of the City, but, only to five thousand; which company the four hundred (when their authority began) had pretended to take unto them as assistants: herein seeming to do little wrong, or none to the Commonalty, who seldom assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeed into the hands of so many, it was soon agreed, that Alciades and his companions should be recalled from exile, and that the Army at Samos should be requested to undertake the Government: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers desire.

How Alcibiades won many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their General, and again deposed.

THIS establishment of things in the City, was accompanied with some good success in the Wars. For the Lacedæmonians were about the same time overthrowen at Sea, in a great Battel, by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alciades afterwards joyning such forces as he could raise, obtained many Victories. Before the Town of Abydos, his arrival with eighteen ships, gave the honour of a great Battel to the Athenians; he overthrowen and utterly destroyed the Fleet of the Lacedæmonians, commanded by Mindarus; took the Towns of Cyzicus and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ransom their City, and fortified Chrysopolis. Hereupon Letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians intercepting, found to contain the distress of the Army, in these few words: All is lost; Mindarus is slain; the Souldiers want victuals; we know not what to do.

Shortly after this, Alciades overthrowen the Lacedæmonians in fight by Land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, besieged and won Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which even in those days was a goodly, rich, and very strong City. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made High Admiral of all the Navy.

But this his honour continued not long, for it was taken from him, and he driven to banish himself again, only because his Lieutenant, contrary to the express command of Alciades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the Fleet.

The second banishment of Alciades, was to the Athenians more harmful than the first; and the loss which thereupon they received, was (though more heavy to them, yet) less to be pitied of others, than that which ensued upon his former exile. For, whereas at the first, he had sought revenge upon his own City; now, as injured to adversity, he rather pitied their fury, who in time of such danger, had cast out him that should have repaired their weak estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamity of his people, to comfort himself after injury received. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alciades, arrived at the Fleet, he presented Battel to Lysander the Lacedæmonian Admiral, who was not so confident upon his former Victory, as to undertake Alciades himself, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former loss of fifteen) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had been under his Lieutenant. But when the Decree of the people was published in the Navy, then did Alciades withdraw himself to a Town upon Hellepont, called Bizantie, where he had built a Castle.

§. XI.

The Battel of Arginusæ, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captains by the people.

AFTER this time, the Athenians receiving many losses and discomfitures, were driven to fly into the Haven of Mytelene, where they were straitly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege, necessity informed them to man all their vessels, and to put the uttermost of their forces into the hazard of one Battel. This Battel was fought at Arginusæ, where Callicratides, Admiral of the Lacedæmonians, losing the honour of the day, preserved his own reputation, by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well have been expected, that the ten Captains, who joyntly had command in chief over the Athenian Fleet, should for that good daies service, and so happy a Victory, have received great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise, they were forthwith called home, and accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunk, to be cast away, when by appointing some vessels to take them up, they might have saved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captains readily made a very just answer, That they pursuing the Victory, had left part of the Fleet, under sufficient men, to save those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindered the performance of that, and other their intentions. This excuse availed not. For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himself escaping in a Meal-tub, had been intreated by those who were in peril of drowning, to desire of the people revenge of their deaths upon the Captains. It was very strange, that upon such an accusation maintained with so slender evidence, men that had well deserved of their Country should be overthrowen. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolve them, save only Socrates the wife and virtuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgement was not regarded. Six of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much ado relieved by other vessels in the storm: but the Captains which were absent escaped; for when the fury of the people was over-past, this judgement was reversed, and the accusers called into question for having deceived and perverted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamy of injustice, but the divine Justice was not asleep, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

The Battel at Egos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian War.

THE Peloponnesian Fleet under Lysander, the year next following, having scoured the Ægean Seas, enter Hellepont, where (landing Souldiers) it besieged and took the Town of Lampsacus. Hereupon all the Navy of Athens, being an hundred and fourscore sail, made thither in haste: but finding Lampsacus taken before their coming, they put in at Sessor, where having refreshed themselves, they sailed to the River called Egos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goats-Brook, or the River of the Goat, being on the Continent opposite to Lampsacus: and there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampsacus in the harbor. The next day after their arrival, they presented fight unto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned again to Egos-Potamos; and thus they continued five daies, braving every day the Enemy, and returning to their own harbour when it drew towards evening.

The Castle of Alciades was not far from the Navy, and his power in those places was such as might have greatly availed his Country-men, if they could have made use of it. For he had waged mercenaries, and making war in his own name upon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. He perceiving the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired unto them, and shewed what great inconvenience might grow, if they did not soon fore-see and prevent it. For they lay in a rode subject to every weather; neither near enough to any Town where they might furnish themselves with necessities, nor so far off as had been more expedient. Seftor was the next Market-town; thither both Souldiers and Mariners resorted, flocking away from the Navy every day, as soon as they were returned from braving the Enemy. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Seftor, which was not far off, or at least to consider how near their Enemy was, whole fear proceeded rather from obedience to their General, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so far despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his own matters, and to remember that his authority was out of date. Had it not been for these opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedemonians, either to fight upon unequal terms, or utterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that he might so have done by transporting the light-armed Thracians, his confederates, and others his followers, over the Straights, who assaulting the Peloponnesians by Land, would either have compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leave their ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsel no better than hath been rehearsed, he left them to their fortunes; which how evil it would be, he did prognosticate.

Lyfander all this while defending himself by the advantage of his Haven, was not careless in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was, to send forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who observing their doings, related unto him what they had seen. Therefore understanding in what careless fashion they roamed up and down the Country; he kept all his men aboard after their departure: and the fifth day gave especial charge to his Scouts, that when they perceived the Athenians disimbarking, as their custom was, and walking towards seftor, they should forthwith return, and hang up a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lyfander being in a readiness, made all speed that strength of Oars could give, to Aggor-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies aboard their ships, nor many near them, and all in great confusion upon the news of his approach.

Inasmuch that the greatest industry which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that loss imported, gave over Athens as desperate, & made a long flight into the Isle of Cyprus; all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came into the refuge, cut in pieces. Thus was the war which had lasted seven and twenty years, with variable success, concluded in one hour, and the glory of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that she never afterward shone in her perfect light.

Immediately upon this Victory, Lyfander, having taken such Towns as readily did yield upon the first fame of his exploit, set sail for Athens, and joining his forces with those of Agis and Pausanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the City; which finding too stubborn to yield, and too strong to be won on the sudden, he put forth again to Sea, and rather by terror than violence, compelled all the Islands, and such Towns of the Ionians as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselves to Sparta, he did thereby cut off all provision of victuals, and other necessities, from the City, and enforced the people by meer famine to yield to these conditions; That the long walls, leading from the Town to the Port, should be thrown down; That all Cities subject to their Estate, should be set at liberty: That the Athenians should be Masters only of their own Territories, and the fields adjoining to their Town; And that they should keep no more than twelve ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the fame, whom the Lacedemonians did, and follow the Lacedemonians as Leaders in the wars.

These Articles being agreed upon, the walls were thrown down with great rejoicing of those who had born displeasure to Athens; and not without some consultation of destroying the City, and laying waste the land about it. Which advice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Governors, or rather cruel Tyrants, appointed over the people, who recompensed their former insolency and injustice over their Captains, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slavery.

The only small hope then remaining to the Athenians was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repair what their own folly had ruined. But the Thirty Tyrants perceiving this, advertised the Lacedemonians thereof, who contrived, and (as now domineering in every quarter) soon effected his sudden death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian war. After which the Lacedemonians abusing the reputation and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to Greece, and by combination of many Cities against them, were dispossessed of their high authority, even in that very age in which they

they had subdued Athens. The greatest foil that they took, was of the Thebans led by Epaninondas, under whom Philip of Macedon Father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the City of Sparta (besides other great losses received) was sundry times in danger of being taken. But these haughty attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the several Estates and Signiories of Greece, were grown so jealous one of another's greatness, that the Lacedemonians, Athenians, Argives, and Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselves with the weaker party, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one

City could extend the limits of her jurisdiction so far as might make her terrible to her neighbours. And thus all parts of the Country remained rather evenly balanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose fore-fathers had been dependants, and followers, yea almost meer Vassals to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found means, by making use of their factions, to bring them all into servitude, from which they never could be free; till the Romans presenting them with a shew of liberty, did themselves indeed become their Masters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian War, or shortly following it.

§. I.

How the affairs of Persia stood in those times.

During the times of this Peloponnesian War, and those other less Expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, having peaceably enjoyed a long reign over the Persians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greek Historians (lightly passing over Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as Usurpers, and for their short reign little to be regarded) place next unto them, or to Xerxes the second; who, and his Brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to have been the Sons of Hester) held the Kingdom but one year between them; the younger succeeding his elder Brother. It is not my purpose (as I have said before) to pursue the History of all the particulars, otherwise than as they shall be incident to the affairs of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Xerxes the second, being a vicious Prince, did perish after a month or two, if not by surfeit, then by the treachery of his riotous Brother Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his Brother, and more cruel, he slew unjustly Agorazus a principal Eunuch, and would have done as much to his Brother Darius the Bastard, had not he foreseen it, and by raising a stronger Army than this hated King Sogdianus could levy, seized at once upon the King and Kingdom.

Darius having slain his Brother, held the Empire nineteen years. Amyrtus of Sais an Egyptian, rebelled against him, and having partly slain, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himself so firmly with the Greeks, that by their aid he maintained the Kingdom, and delivered it over to his posterity, who (notwithstanding the fury of their civil Wars) maintained it against the Persians, all the daies of this Darius, and of his Son Artaxerxes Mnemon. Likewise Amorges, a subject of his own, and of the Royal blood, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himself with the Athenians. But the great calamity, before spoken of, which fell upon the Athenians in Sicily, having put new life into the Spartans, and given courage to the Islanders and others, subject to the State of Athens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage; It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedemonians being destitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Navy, without which it was impossible to advance the War against the State of Athens, that remained powerful by Sea, were driven to crave his assistance, he granted unto them, first upon what conditions best pleased himself, though afterwards the Articles of the League between him and them, were set down in more precise terms; wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make war jointly upon the Athenians, and upon all that should rebel from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia which had formerly been his, or his Predecessors, should return to his obedience. By this Treaty, and the War ensuing (of which I have already spoken) he recovered all that his Grandfather and Father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedæmonians, he got Amorges alive into his hands, who was taken in the City of Jafus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him. Nevertheless Egypt still held out against him; the cause whereof cannot be the employment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece: for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with golds, which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his natural enemies, what the valour of his own Subjects was insufficient to perform. Darius had in marriage Parysatis his own Sister, who bare unto him (besides other children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to say, the Mindful, or the Remembere, who succeeded him in the Kingdom; and Cyrus the younger, a Prince of singular virtue, and accounted, by all that knew him, the most excellent man that ever Persia bred after Cyrus the great. But the old King Darius, intending to leave unto his eldest Son Artaxerxes the inheritance of the great Empire, did cast a jealous eye upon the doings of young Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, took more upon him than befit a Subject: for which cause his Father sent for him, with intent to have taken some very sharp course with him, had not his own death prevented the coming of his younger Son, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the war between these Brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall have occasion to speak somewhat in more convenient place.

§. II. How the thirty Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

How the thirty Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

I Hold it in this place very convenient to show the proceedings of the Greeks, after the subversion of the walls of Athen, which gave end to that War called the Peloponnesian War, but could not free the unhappy Country of Greece from civil broils. The thirty Governours, commonly called the thirty Tyrants of Athen, were chosen the first by the people to compile a body of their Law, and make a collection of such ancient Statutes as were meet to be put in practice: the condition of the City standing as it did in that for sudden alteration. To this charge was annexed the supreme authority; either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessity of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being uncertain, it was fit that such men should give judgement in particular causes, to whose judgement the Laws themselves, by which the City was to be ordered, were become subject. But these thirty, having too great power in their hands, were more careful to hold it, than to deserve it by faithful execution of that which was committed to them in trust.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellows as were odious to the City, though not punishable therefore by Law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approved, who considered their lewd conditions, but did not without bethink themselves, how easy a thing it would be unto these thirty men, to take away the lives of Innocents, by calling them perturbors of the peace, or what else they listed, when condemnation without true trial and proof had been once well allowed. Having thus plausibly entered into a wicked course of Government, they thought it best to fortifie themselves with a rare guard; ere they brake but into those disorders, which they must needs commit for the establishing of their authority. Wherefore dispatching two of their own company to Sparta; they informed the Lacedæmonians, that it was the full intent of the Thirty, to keep the City free from all rebellious motions: to which purpose, it behooved them to cut off such as were seditious, and therefore desired the Lacedæmonians to send them a Garrison, which they promised at their own cost to maintain. This motion was well approved, and a Guard was sent, the Captain of which was well esteemed and by the Thirty, that none of their friends could want his high commendations in Sparta; whereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and doing no more afraid, bade the persons invade the principal men of the City, and taking armed men from house to house, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely to be able to make any head against this wicked form of Government, whereby there was such effusion of blood, as the Athenians (one of the Thirty) termed very horrible, and unable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discovered, caused his fellows to bethink themselves themselves, and provide for their own security, and his destruction, lest he should make himself a Captain of the discontented (which were almost the whole City) and redeem his own peace with their ruine. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and gave unto them some part of the publick authority, the rest they disarmed; and having thus increased their own strength, and weakened their opposites, they began a-fresh to shed the blood, not only of their private enemies, but of such whole many, or goods, might enrich them, and enable them for the payment of their Guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that every one of them should name one man, upon whose goods he should seize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes uttered his detestation of so wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the thirty was most tyrannical, accuse him to the Council, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one main privilege of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirty, but have the accustomed trial) he took upon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes and so reduced him under the trial and sentence of that order. It was well alleged by Theramenes that his name was not more easy to be blotted out of the catalogue, than any other mans; upon which consideration, he advised them all to conceive no otherwise of his case, than as of their own, who were liable to the same form of proceeding; but every man chusing rather to preserve his own life by silence, than presently to draw upon himself the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would never come near him; the Tyrants intreating silence as consent, condemned him forthwith; and compelled him to drink poison.

From this time the thirty Tyrants, and the conspirators, began to show their cruelty.

III. The conspirators against the thirty Tyrants, and the conspirators.

After the death of Theramenes, the thirty Tyrants, to put such out-rages as exceeded about corners Villanies. For having three thousand (as they thought) firm unto them, they rubbed all others without fear or shame, despoiling them of lands and goods, and caused them to fly into banishment, for the sake of their wives. This flight of the Citizens procured their liberty, and the general good of the City. For the banished Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entered into consultation, and resolved to hazard their lives in setting free the City of Athen. The very thought of such a practice had been treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seventy men, or thereabout, were the first undertakers, who with their Captain Thrasybulus took Phyla, a place of strength in the Territory of Athen. No sooner did the thirty hear of their exploit, than seek means to prevent further dangers, assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedæmonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some loss of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by means of snow that fell, and other stormy weather, against which they had not made provision. Retiring therefore to the City which above all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of horse, to weary out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrasybulus were increased from seventy to seven hundred, which adventured to give charge upon those guards, of whom they cut off above an hundred and twenty. These small but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburb of Athen, lying on the Port. Before their coming the thirty had resolved to fortifie the Town of Eleusine, to their own use, whereinto they might make an easy retreat, and save themselves from any sudden peril. It may well seem strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of Government had brought them into such danger, they were loath from seeking to obtain mens good will, that contrariwise, to assure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could bear arms into their hands by a train, and wickedly (though under form of Justice) murdered them all. But, sceleribus tantum per scelera est iter, the mischiefs which they had already done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparent likelihood of safety, than by extending their cruelty unto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasybulus and his fellows, who as yet were termed conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed again by the Tyrants, and brought to assault it; but in this intreprize Thrasybulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom though there were slain to the number of seventy only, yet the Victory seemed the greater, greater, because Critias, and one other of the thirty, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Pireus, together with some exhortations used by Thrasybulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the thirty were deposed. Nevertheles there were so many of the three thousand, who having communicated with the thirty in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharp account, that no peace, nor quiet form of Government could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who craving aid against Thrasybulus and his followers, had favourable audience, and a power sent to their assistance, both by land and sea, under the conduct of Lysander, and his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Army of the Cities confederate with the Lacedæmonians. And here appeared first the jealousy, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Boeotians and Corinthians, who in the late wars had been the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alleging that it stood not with their oaths, to make war against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing indeed, lest the Lacedæmonians should annex the Territory of Athens to their own Demains. It is not to be doubted, that Pausanias took this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to cross the proceedings of Lysander, whom he envied. Therefore having in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasybulus his party, made a shew of war, he finally wrought such means, that all things were compounded quietly: the thirty men, and such others as were like to give cause of tumults, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannical faction, having withdrawn themselves to Eleusis, were shortly after found to attempt some innovations; whereupon the whole City rising against them, took their Captains, as they were coming to Parly, and slew them: which done, to avoid further inconvenience, a law was made, that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully observed, the City returned to her former quietness.

Of the Expedition of Cyrus the younger.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt against his Brother.

THE matters of Greece standing upon such terms, that no one Estate durst oppose it self against that of Lacedæmon; young Cyrus, Brother to Artaxerxes King of Persia, having in his Fathers life-time very carefully prosecuted the War against Athens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their love might appear no less to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous War against the Athenians. To this request, being general, the Lacedæmonians gave a suitable answer; commanding the Admiral to perform unto Cyrus all service that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himself, and the Lacedæmonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdom of Persia should have been the recompence of his deserts; or that, he perishing in battel, as after he did, the subversion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew unto the Greeks the wayes, which under the Macedonian Emperors, the victorious foot-steps of their posterity should measure; and opening unto them the riches, and withal the weakness of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that Conquest, which he reserved to another generation; than to give into their hands that mighty Kingdom, whose love was not yet come. The love which Parysatis the Queen-mother of Persia bare unto Cyrus her younger son, being seconded by the earnest favour of the people, and ready desires of many principal men, had moved this young Prince, in his Fathers old age, to aspire after the Succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before been shewed) whose meaning was to curb this ambitious Youth; he found his elder brother Artaxerxes

Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings favour, that it were not safe to attempt any means of displanting him, by whose disfavour himself might easily lose the place of Viceroy, which he held in Asia the less, and hardly be able to maintain his own life. The nearest neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardice, treachery, craft, and all vices which customably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, using by the way all fair shews of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought, that Queen Parysatis had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Parysatis had used the best of her endeavour to that purpose, alleging that (which in former ages had been much available to Xerxes, in the like disception with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was born whilst his Father was a private man, but Cyrus, when he was crowned King. All which not sufficing; when the moit that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanor, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoining; then did this Tissaphernes discover his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Upon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily believed, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreaty of his Mother very hardly delivered, and sent back into his own Province.

§. II.

The preparations of Cyrus, and his first entry into the War.

THE form of Government which the Persian Lieutenants used in their several Provinces, was in many points almost Regal. For they made war and peace, as they thought it meet, not only for the Kings behoof, but for their own reputation; usually indeed with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their own heads were held only at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his will, whatsoever it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himself, the interest that he had in the Kingdom, the small assurance of his Brothers love, held only by his Mothers intercession, the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the means which he had by love of his own people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedæmonians, whom he had bound unto him, to obtain the Crown for himself. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waiting till occasion should present it self: but rather enterprize somewhat whilst yet his Mother lived, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon he first began to quarrel with Tissaphernes, and seized upon many Towns of his Jurisdiction, annexing them to his own Province, which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that he was of condition somewhat simple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomed Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in private quarrels. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, and cowardice despised, although he durst not adventure to take arms against Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milesians were about to give up themselves into the hands of that young Prince, as many other Towns of the Ionians had done, thought by terror to preserve his reputation, and keep the Town in his own hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing fair occasion to take arms, which was no small part of his desire. In levying Souldiers he used great policy; for he took not only the men of his own Province, or of the Countries adjoining, whose lives were ready at his will, but secretly he furnished some Grecian Captains with money, who being very good men of War, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessaly, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to cross the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their several Wars, that the Souldiers might be held in continual exercise, and ready in arms upon the sudden. Cyrus having sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greeks, who very readily came over to his assistance, being thirteen thousand very firm Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Army, and that which he had levied before, he could very easily have forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the less: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters; that was to be employed in the accomplishment of higher designs. Pretending therefore that the

the Pisidians, a people of Asia the less, not subject to the Persian, had invaded his Territory; he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speed marched Eastward, leaving Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to rejoice that Cyrus had left him to himself, when he considered, that so great an Army, and so strong, was never levied against the Rovers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of five hundred horse, he posted away to carry tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus took his journey into the higher Asia, and came up to his Brother.

THE tumult which his coming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Statira, against Parisatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the war. But whilst the King in great fear was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger halted upon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, having his number much increased by the repair of his Countrymen, though most strengthened by the access of seven hundred Greeks, and of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted unto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by trial in a Muster, which (to please the Queen of Cicilia, who had brought him aid) he made in Phrygia; where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge upon the rest of his Army, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Camp (not perceiving that this was but a bravery) fled a main, the victuallers and baggagers forsaking their Cabins, and running all away for very fear. This was to Cyrus a joyful spectacle, who knew very well, that his Brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more unlikely to make resistance, because they were prest to the war against their will and dispositions, whereas his Army was drawn along by milder affection and good will. Nevertheless he found it a very hard matter to persuade the Greeks to pass the River of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had trodden, wearied them with the conceit of the tedious return. Therefore he was driven, being yet in Cicilia, to seek excites, telling them, that Abrocomus, one of the Kings principal Captains, and his own great enemy, lay by the River, against whom he requested them to assist him. By such devices, and excessive promise of reward, he brought them to Emphrates; where some of the Greeks considering, That who so passed the River first, should have the most thanks, and might safely return if the rest should refuse to follow them; they entered the Fords, whereby all were finally persuaded to do as some had begun: and being allured by great hopes, they resolved to seek out Artaxerxes, wheresoever he was to be found. The King in the mean time having raised an Army of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident upon this huge multitude, as to adventure them in trial of a plain battle. Abrocomus, who with three hundred thousand men, had undertaken to make good the Straights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong wall, and other defences of nature and art, which made the place to seem impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himself toward the Kings forces, not daring to look Cyrus in the face; who despairing to find any way by Land, had procured the Lacedemonian Fleet, by the benefit whereof to have transported his Army. I do not find that this cowardice of Abrocomus, or his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Camp, till five days were past after the battle, received either punishment, or disgrace; for they, toward whom he withdrew himself; were all made of the same metal.

Therefore Artaxerxes was upon the point of retiring to the uttermost bounds of his Kingdom, until by Tribazus, one of his Captains, he was persuaded not to abandon so many goodly Provinces to the enemy, who would thereby have gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharp dispute of a Title to a Kingdom is most available) would have grown superior in reputation. By such advice, the King resolved upon meeting with his Brother, who now began to be secure, being fully persuaded, that Artaxerxes would never dare to abide him in the field. For the King having cast up a Trench of almost forty miles in length, about thirty foot broad, and eighteen foot deep, intended there to have encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe, as to be far distant from his enemies.

§. IV.

The Battle between Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

THE Army of Cyrus having overcome many difficulties of evil waies, and scarcity scarcity of victuals, was much encouraged by perceiving this great fear of Artaxerxes, and being past this Trench, marched carelessly in great disorder, having bestowed their Arms in Carts, and upon Beasts of carriage; when on the sudden one of their Van-cuirors, brought news of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselves, and had ranged their Battels in good order upon the side of the River Emphrates, where they waited for the coming of their enemies, whom they saw not till it was afternoon. But when they saw the cloud of dust raised by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceived by their near approach how well they were marshalled, coming on very orderly in silence, whereas it had been expected, that rushing violently with loud clamors, they should have spent all their force upon the first brunt, and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were so unequal in distant, being all embattled in one body and square, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the midst of his own, did not with the corner, and utmost point thereof, reach to the half breadth of Artaxerxes his batel, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greeks begin to distrust their own manhood, which was not accustomed to make proof of it self, upon such excessive odds. It was almost incredible, that so great an Army should be so easily chased. Nevertheless, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, having learned (contrary to their custom) to give charge upon their enemies with silence, had not learned (for it was contrary to their nature) to receive a strong charge with courage. Upon the very first offer of an on-set, made by the Greeks, all that beastly rabble of cowards fled again, without abiding the stroke, or staying till they were within reach of a dart. The Chariots armed with hooks and sithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did small hurt that day, because the drivers of them leaping down, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his enemies gave so much confidence to Cyrus and his Followers, that such as were about him forthwith adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had been assured unto him that day, had not he sought how to declare himself worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiving that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompass the Greeks, and to set upon them in the rear, he advanced with six hundred Horse, and gave so valiant a charge upon a Squadron of six thousand, which lay before the King, that he brake it, laying the Captain thereof Artaiges, with his own hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole company of six hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chase, leaving Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiving where the King stood in troop, uncertain whether to fight, or leave the field, could not contain himself, but said, I see the man: and presently, with a small handful of men about him, ran upon his Brother, whom he strake through the Curace, and wounded in the breast. Having given this stroke, which was his last, he received immediately the fatal blow, which gave period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded under the eye with a Dart, thrown by a base fellow, wherewith astonished, he fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was impossible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safety; not caring afterwards for their own lives, when once they perceived that Cyrus their Master was slain. Artaxerxes caught the head and right hand of his Brother to be forthwith stricken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing them, fled apace, calling upon the name of Cyrus, and desiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troops, and utterly dismayed such Persian Captains, as were now, even in their own eyes, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Camp of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned; from whence Artaxerxes making all speed, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greeks, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There he met with Tissaphernes, who having made way through the Battel of the Greeks, was ready now to join with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the news, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his Brothers death, been sufficient to countervail all disasters received, the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greeks, would have yielded little comfort. For Tissaphernes had not slain any one man of the Greeks, but contrariwise, when he came upon them, they opening their Battel, drove him with great slaughter through them, in such wise, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the Squadron of the Greeks. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greeks, as Masters of the field, gave chase to all that came in their sight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greeks, intending to set upon them in the rear. But these good Souldiers perceiving the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seek honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued unto a certain Village, that lay under a hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a bravery, than with purpose to attempt upon these bold fellows any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom he would seem to have slain with his own hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to give reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that he might now preserve well enough, shewing a manly look half a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displayed on the top of a Spear. This ensign might have encouraged his people, had not some of the Greeks elied it, who not meaning that he should abide so near them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discovering their approach, fled upon the spur: so that none remained in the place of battel, save only the Greeks, who had lost that day not one man, not taken any other harm, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondered that they heard no news of Cyrus, but thinking that he was pursuing the Army, they thought it was fittest for them, having that day done enough, to return to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings coming had given them no leisure to dine.

§. V.

The hard estate of the Greeks after the fight; and how Artaxerxes in vain sought to have made them yield unto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sun, and they bringing home dark night with them, found their Camp spoiled, little or nothing being left that might serve for food: so that wanting victuals to satisfy their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with sleep. In the mean season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entered by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the baleness of his people, and weakness of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greeks: which gave him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shameful demeanor of his Army, should live to carry tidings home, it would not be long ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signory. Wherefore he resolved to try all means, whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had seen: to which purpose he sent them a brave message the next morning; charging them to deliver up their Arms, and come to his Gates, to await there upon his Mercy. It seems that he was in good hope to have found their high courages broken, upon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceived in that thought. For the Greeks being advertised that morning from Arius, a principal Commander under Cyrus, that his Master being slain, he had retired himself to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from thence, whence intending to return into Ionis, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would joyn with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they sent answer back to Arius, that having beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arius himself in the Kings Throne, if he would joyn with them, and pursue the victory. Before they received any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Camp, whose errand seemed to the Captains very insolent: One told them, that it was not for the Vanquishers to yield their Weapons; another, that he would dye ere he yielded to such a motion: a third asked, whether the King, as having the victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in a way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesy he meant to requite their kindness. To this question Phalimus a Grecian, waiting upon Tissaphernes, answered; That the King having slain Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the midst whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold up their throats; for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalimus, that having nothing left, but their Arms and Valour, whilst they kept their Arms, their Valour would be serviceable; but should they yield them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remain their own. Hereat Phalimus laughed, saying; This

This young man did seem a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech; but that his deep speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Arms and Valour to prevail against the great King. It seems that Phalimus being a Courtier, and employed in a business of importance, thought himself too profound a States-man, to be checked in his Embassy by a bookish dissembler. But his wisdom herein failed him. For whatsoever he himself was (of whom no more is known, than that he brought an unonest message to his own Country-men, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Lives, to the merciless Barbarians;) this young Scholar by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principal Commanders were surprised by treachery of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having never seen the wars before, undertook the conduct of the Army, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all thole, and from greater dangers than Phalimus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithful to the King, as they had been to Cyrus, offering their service in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might have use of them. But the final answer was, That without Weapons they could neither do the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalimus delivered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilst they abode where they then were, denouncing War if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their answer. Clearchus the General told him, They liked it. How (saith Phalimus) mult I understand you? As choosing peace if we stay, or otherwise war, said Clearchus. But whether war or peace, quoth this politike Embassador? To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose,) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him, no wiser than he came. All that day the Greeks were fain to feed upon their Horses, Asses, and other Beasts, which they roasted with Arrows, Darts, and wooden Targets, thrown away by the Enemies.

§. VI.

How the Greeks began to return homewards.

AT night they took their way towards Arius, to whom they came at midnight; being forsaken by four hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled over to the King; by whom they were entertained, I do not find. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces, for had they been kindly used, it may well be thought that some of them should have accompanied Tissaphernes, and served as Stales to draw in the rest. Arius being of too base a temper, and birth, to think upon seeking the Kingdom for himself, with such assistance as might have given it unto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make covenant with them for mutual assistance unto the last: Whereunto both parts having (worn, he advised them to take another way homeward, which should be somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relieve them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a wearisome march, and tired the Souldiers, they found the Kings Army which had coasted them, lodged in certain Villages, where they purposed themselves to have encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because he would not seem by declining them, to shew fear, or weakness. That the Kings men were contented to remove, and give place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behaviour; Nor strange, that the Gracians, being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an unknown Country, should be very fearful: but it is almost past belief, that the noise which was heard of these poor men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition enforced them to do, should make the Persians fly out of their Camp, and so affright the great King, that in stead of demanding their Arms, he should crave peace of them. The next day very early came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free access for Embassadors, to entreat of peace. Were it not that such particulars do best open the quality of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to run over the general passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battel, because the Greeks (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to hear of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the indignity, was contented sweetly to swallow down this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of victuals to relieve them.

How Tissaphernes, under colour of peace, betrayed all the Captains of the Greeks.

Hitherto the Greeks, relying upon their own virtue, had rather advanced their affairs, than brought themselves into any straits or terms of disadvantage. But now came unto them the subtil Fox Tissaphernes, who circumventing the Chief Commanders by fine sleights, did mischievously entrap them, to the extreme danger of the Army. He told them, that his Province, lying near unto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliverance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countrymen at home, would not be unthankful for such a benefit. Herewithall he forgot not to rehearse the great service that he had done to his Master, being the first that advertised him of Cyrus his intent, and having not only brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battel shewed his face to the Greeks, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Camp, and gave chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alledge to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you safe into Greece; in which suite I have good hope to speed, if you will send a mild answer to him, who hath willed me to ask you, for what cause ye have born Arms against me. The Captains hearing this, were contented to give gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly, as he said) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were; That they should pass freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they took, and committing no spoil: yet that it should be lawful for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to afford them an open Market. Hereupon both parties having sworn, the League was concluded; and Tissaphernes, returning to the King to take leave, and end all business came unto them again after twenty days, and then they set forward. This interim of twenty days, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministered great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breed doubt, the Brethren, the Kindred of Arctus, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldiers, did work him and them to with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more strange to the Greeks than formerly he had been. This caused many to advise Clearchus, rather to pass forward as well as he might, than to rely upon covenants, and sit still whilst the King layed snares to entrap them. But he on the contrary perswaded them, to rest contented whilst they were well, and not to cast themselves again into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treaty; reciting withall their own wants, and the Kings means, but especially the Oathes mutually given and taken, whereby he saw no reason why the enemy should have clogged himself if he meant mischief, having power enough to do them harm by a fair and open War.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatness and place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed; for as much as no enforcement, or base respect, was like to have drawn it from him. But his falshood was such, both in substance and in success, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountain of Truth, I hate a rich man a liar. A lie may find excuse when it grows out of fear: for that passion hath his original from weakness. But when Power, which is a character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of untruth, the falshood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, advancing his own strength against the Divine Justice, doth commit that sin with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with sure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found means to destroy all the Captains, whom he subtilly got into his power by a train; making the General Clearchus himself the mean to draw in all the rest. The business was contrived thus: Having travelled some days together in such wise, that the Persians did not encamp with the Greeks, who were very jealous of the great familiarity appearing between Tissaphernes and Arius; Clearchus thought it convenient to root out of Tissaphernes his brains all causes of distrust, whereof many had grown in that short time. To which purpose obtaining private conference with him, he rehearsed the Oath of Confederacy, which had past between them, shewing how religiously he would keep it; and, repeating the benefits, which the Greeks did receive by the help of Tissaphernes, he promised that their love should appear to him unfruitful, if he would make use of their service against the Assyrians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infect his provinces; or against the

the Egyptians, who were then Rebels to the Great King. For which cause he desired him, that whereas all divine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not give place to any close accusation or suspicion, whereby might grow sudden inconvenience to either of them, upon no just ground. The faithless Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministered fair occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to mind how many waies he could have used to bring them to confusion, without peril to himself; especially by burning the Country, through which they were to pass, whereby they must needs have perished by meer famine. For which cause he said, that it had been great folly, to seek by perjury, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands. But the truth was, that his own love to them had moved him to work their safety, not only for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himself, and the King, by their assistance; but for that he might by their friendship, hope to obtain what Cyrus had willed. Finally, he invited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captains with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissention between them. Clearchus himself being thus deceived, with great importunity drew all the chief Commanders, and many of the inferior Leaders to repair with him to the Camp of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers, as it had been to some common Fair. But being there arrived, Clearchus, with other the five principal Colonels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a sign was given, upon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slain. Forthwith certain bands of Persian Horsemen scoured the field, killing as many Greeks as they met, and riding up to the very Camp of the Grecians, who wondered much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping sorely wounded, informed them of all that had been done. Hereupon the Greeks took Arms in haste, thinking that the enemy would forthwith have assailed their Camp. Anon they might perceive the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his own Brother, And Arius, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principal men in the Army, saying, That they brought a message from the King, which Arius delivered to this effect: That Clearchus having broken his faith, and the league made, was justly rewarded with death; that Memnon and Proxenus, two other of the five Colonels, for detesting his treachery, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to surrender their arms, which were due to him, as having belonged unto his servant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed upon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, that if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that he was in such sort punished: but he willed them to send back Memnon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greeks might be advised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadors knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus and the other four were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandment their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amiss to prevent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousness of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Province waited by the Greeks, against whom receiving from his Master convenient aid of men and money, he did so ill manage his affairs, that neither subtilty, nor perjury (to which he failed not to have recourse) availed him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant unto those parts, who took it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treachery, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the service which he could not do, he was thought upon private ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to fly from the stroke, all the world being thus against him. But now let us return to the prosperity, wherein he triumphed without great cause, having betrayed braver men than himself, and intending to bring the like mischief upon the whole Army.

§. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greeks, and in despite of Tissaphernes went off safely.

Great was the heaviness of the Souldiers, being now left destitute of Leaders, and no less their fear of the evil hanging over their heads, which they knew not well how how to avoid. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deep sadness of the whole Army, to be such as hindered them from taking any course of preventing the danger at hand, began to advise the under-officers of Proxenus his Companies, whose familiar friend he had been, to bethink themselves of some mean, whereby their safety might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoever might serve for to give them hope, and above all, perswading them in no wise to yield to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take upon him the charge of that Regiment; and so together with him, the same night calling up such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeed in the places of those who were slain, or taken. This being done, and order set down for disbanding the Army of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the loss of Tissaphernes his assistance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheap than he had been wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take up their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentiful Villages, and so to proceed, marching towards the heads of those great Rivers, which lay in their way, and to pass them where they were fordable. Many attempts were made upon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, serving all on foot, were not able to require for the harm which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greeks could reach. For this cause did Xenophon provide slings, wherewith he overreached the enemy; and finding some horses fit for service, that were employed among the carriages, he set men upon them; training likewise his Archers to shoot compass, who had been accustomed to the point-blank. By these means did he bear off the Persians, who assailed him; and sometimes gave them chafe with that band of fifty Horses, which being well backt with a firm body of footmen, and seconded with troops of the light-armed shot and slingers, compelled the enemy to lye aloof. Tissaphernes not daring to come to handy grips with these valiant men, did possess the tops of mountains, and places of advantage, by which they were to pass. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he betook himself to that course, which was indeed the surest, of burning the Country. With great sorrow did the Greeks behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some advised to defend the Country, as granted by the enemy himself to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Persians might be affrighted to do that which was the desire of such as made passage in hostile manners. But these were faint comforts. The best counsel was, that being near unto the Carduchi, a people enemy to the Persians, they should enter into their Country, passing over some high mountains which lay between them. This course they followed, which could not have availed them, if Tissaphernes had begun sooner to cut off their victuals, rather than to seek to force, or circumvent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greek Army found in passing thorow the Land of the Carduchi.

ENTRING upon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountered with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persians, were no way inferior to the Greeks in daring, but only in the Art of War. They were very light of foot, skilful Archers, and used the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Country were of much use against these poor travellers, afflicting them in seven daies which they spent in that passage, far more than all the power of the Great King had done. Between the Territory of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ran Centrites, a great River, upon which the Greeks refreshed themselves one day, rejoicing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would prove easie. But the next morning they saw certain troops of Horses, that lay to forbid their passage. These were levied by the Kings Deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies having taken their way towards Ionia. The River was broad and deep, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite banks. To increase these dangers, the Carduchi, following upon them, lay on the side of a Mountain, within less than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discover a Ford, by which the greater number of them passing over, did easily chafe away the Subjects of the Persians, and then sending back the most expedite men, gave succour to the Rear-ward, against which the Carduchi duchi being slightly armed, could not on plain ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seem to have inhabited the Mountains of Niphates, which are not far from the Spring of Tygris, though Ptolemy place them far more to the East upon the River of Cyrrus in Media; wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded upon his own knowledge, doth best in this case deserve credit. Of the River Centrites (as of many other Rivers, Towns, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may endure the severity of a Critick. For Ptolemy, and the whole Nation of Geographers, add small light to this Expedition: only of this last, I think it the same which falleth into Tygris, not much above Artaxagarta, springing out of Niphates, and running by the Town of Sardevus in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greeks having passed Centrites did arrive.

How Teribazus Governour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greeks with terms of feigned peace, was disappointed, and shamefully beaten.

THE Army finding in Armenia good provision, marched without any disturbance about fifty or three score miles to the heads of the River Tygris, and passing over them, travelled as far further without resistance, till they were encountered by Teribazus, at the River Teleboa, which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though small, but Ptolemy and others omit it. Teribazus governed that Country for the Persians, and was in great favour with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seem to have been a School, where the Art of falsehood was taught as wisdom. He desired peace of the Greeks, which was made upon this condition, That they should take what they pleased, but not burn down the Towns and Villages in their way. As soon as he had made this league, he levied an Army, & besetting the streights of certain Mountains which they were to pass, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might give him the commendation of being no less craftily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of success. For a great Snow fell, which caused the Greeks to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandered about seeking relief. By the fires he was discovered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greeks, taking this captive with them for a guide, sought him out; and coming upon his Camp, did to affright him, that before the whole Army could arrive there, the shout which was raised by the Van-cuirors, chased him away. They took his Pavillion, wherein (besides many slaves, that were Artificers of voluptuousness) very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Army went Northward, and passing Euphrates, not far below the springs thereof, travelled with much difficulty through deep Snow, being followed aloof by the enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found stragling behind. The Inhabitants of the Country, thorow which they marched, had their wintering houses under ground, wherein was found great plenty of Victuals, and of Cattel, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Having refreshed themselves in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable journey, which had consumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-slaves, and taking away (besides other Horses and Cattel) some Colts that were bred up for the Great King.

§. XI.

The passage of the Army to Trabysiond, thorow the Countries bordering upon the River of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the River Phasis, near whereunto the people called Phagians, Tacchi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations joined together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountains, which the Greeks were to pass, made countenance of war: but some Companies being sent by night to seize upon a place of equal height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to flye, every one retiring to the defence of his own. The first upon whose Country the Greeks did enter, were the Tacchi, who conveying all their provision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Army into much want, until with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of Cattel were taken; the people, to avoid captivity, threw themselves head-long down the rocks, the very women throwing down down first their own children, and then casting themselves upon them. Here was taken a great booty of Cattel, which served to feed them, travelling through the Land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountered the Greeks hand to hand, killing as many as they took prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great grief of their companions living; who were glad, when after seven dayes journey they escaped from those continual skirmishes, wherewith they had been vexed by these Barbarians. Hence travelling through a good corn-Country, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Scythini, they came to a rich Town, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoining, used them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountain, whence they might discover the Euxine Sea. From Gymnias (which was the name of his Town) he led them through the Territory of his enemies, desiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After five dayes march, they came to a Mountain called Teibes, being (as I think) a part of the Mountains called Moschici, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course: and passing friendly through the Region of the Maerones, (with whom by means of an interpreter, found among themselves, who born in that place had been sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the Land of Cholebis, wherein stands the City of * Trabisond, called then Trapezus, a Colony of the Greeks. The Colchis entreating them with hostility, were required with the like; for the Army having now good leisure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoil the Country thirty dayes together, forbearing only the Borders upon Trabisond, at the Citizens request.

§. XII.

How the Army began at Trabisond to provide a Fleet, wherewith to return home by Sea: how they came into the Territory of Sinope, and there prosecuted the same purpose.

HAVING now found an Haven-Town, the Souldiers were desirous to take shipping, and change their tedious Land-journeys into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherophylus a Lacedemonian, one of the principal Commanders, promised by means of Anaxibius the Lacedemonian Admiral, who was his friend, that he would provide Vessels to embark them. Having thus concluded, they likewise took order for the staying of such ships as should pass that way, meaning to use them for their Navigation. Left all this provision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Army, Xenophon periwaded the Cities adjoining to clear the wayes, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were utterly unwilling to give ear, being desirous to return by Sea: but the Country, fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabisond: the other took Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were stayed to increase the fleet. After long abode, when victuals began to fail, by reason that all the Land of the Colchis, near unto the Camp, was already quite wasted, they were fain to embark their sick men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Army took their way by Land to Cerasus, a Greek Town, where the Fleet likewise arrived. Here the Army being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand and six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Country of the * Molynaci, who were divided into factions. The stronger party despoiling their friendship, caused them to joyn them with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was * Cotyora, a Greek Town likewise, and a Colony of the Synopians, as Trapezus and Cerasus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sick men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entered the Town by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sick in convenient lodgings taking into their own hands the custody of the Gates. Provision for the Army they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territory of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Town. These news were unwelcome to * Sinope, whence Embassadors were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, lings, and threatening to joyn with the Paphlagonians, if redress could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon. That meer necessity had enforced the Army to teach those of Cotyora good manners in so bad a method: Letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them and the Paphlagonian at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Sinope it self; to which, if cause were given, they would lend assistance. Upon this answer the Embassadors grew better advised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Town of Cotyora to relieve the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with shipping, letting them understand how difficult the passage by Land would prove, in regard of the many and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Haly, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good counsel, and the fair promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Army, which well perceived, that the City of Sinope would spare no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would pass the rest of the way by Sea; provided, that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serve to imbarke every one of them, then would they not put from the shore.

§. XIII.

Of dissention which arose in the Army, and how it was imbarked.

HITHERTO the danger of Enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the company in firm unity; which now began to dilolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring air of Greece, warming their heads with private respects to their several ends and purposes. Whilst they, who were sent as Agents from the Camp, remained at Sinope; Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunity of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honorable work to build a City in those parts, which were soon like to prove great and wealthy, in regard both of their own puissance, and of the great repair of the Greeks into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Country, divining of his success by the entrails of beasts. The South-layer whom he employed, had received a great reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not give battle in ten days: he therefore, having preserved his money carefully, was desirous to be soon at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diversity of mens opinions; some approving the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this consultation, were fore afraid, lest the poverty of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintain themselves at home, should give success to the project. Which to prevent, they promised to supply the Army with a sufficient Fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captains, who thereupon undertook to give the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set sail for Greece. One of these Captains being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Troas; another offered to lead them into Cherronesus. Xenophon, who desired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that he would have them to set forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a Traitor that should forsake the Army, before such time as they were arrived at their journeys end. Silanus the South-layer, who had uttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby stayed from out-running his fellows, and driven to abide with his wealth among poor men, longer than stood with his good liking. Alas the other Captains were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived, that ships were prepared sufficient for their Navigation, but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope and Heraclea, knowing that the Army was now resolved for the voyage, and that Xenophon whom they feared, had periwaded them to this resolution, thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Navy, whilst they were in good readiness, to depart, but to keep the money to themselves. The Captains therefore, who being disappointed by these Towns, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with fair hopes, repented much of their fair offers, and signifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make proposition to the Army, of taking the ships, and failing to Thasos, where they might seize upon Lands, and plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the business, they began to work the principal of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These news becoming publick, bred a suspicion of Xenophon, as if he had won the rest of the Captains to his purpose, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their own home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gave them satisfaction, and withal complained of some disorders, which he caused them to redress. A general inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadors from Coryllas, Lord of the Raphlagonians, who sending presents, desired peace of the Greeks: the Embassadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have been sought, for that the Greeks, having now their fleet in a readiness, did soon weigh Anchors, and set sail for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxilias, who promised to give the Army pay as soon as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIV.

Another great dissention and distraction of the Army. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by Xenophon.

THE nearer that they approached to Greece, the greater was their desire to make provision for themselves, that they might not return home empty-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Army were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, he might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon sole Commander of all; in whose favour as well the Captains as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedemonians, who were jealous of him already (being incensed by that fugitive who forsook the Army at Traizon, lying with one of their two ships) or moved by some tokens appearing to him in the intrails that threatened ill success to his Government, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laid upon Cherisophus a Lacedemonian. It seems that Xenophon, considering the vexation incident to the conduct of a voluntary Army, wanting pay, did wisely in yielding to such tokens as forbade him to accept it: especially knowing how to well their desire, which was, by right or by wrong, to get wealth wheresoever it might be found, without all regard of friend or foe. Cherisophus had been General but six or seven days, when he was deposed; for having been unwilling to rob the Town of Heraclea, which had sent presents to the

Camp, and been very beneficial unto them in lending ships for their transportation. Two dates they had failed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great Rivers, which would have given impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one seditious man began to put them in mind of seeking to get somewhat for themselves: telling them that all their provision would be spent in three days, and that being now come out of the enemies Country, victuals and other necessities could not be had without money; for which cause he gave advice to send messengers into the Town of Heraclea, giving the Citizens to understand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of money, called Cyziceni, which sum amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the sum raised to ten thousand Cyziceni; at least; which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being General, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon, but in vain, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Left therefore either of these should fail in managing the business which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and less discretion were sent; who in such wise delivered their insolent message that the Citizens taking time to deliberate upon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Town, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the Walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their ravenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians and Acheans, they forsook immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, chusing new Leaders out of their own number. Above four thousand and five hundred they were, all heavily armed, who electing ten captains, failed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the midway between Heraclea and Byzantium, with purpose to assail the Bythinians on the sudden. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and four hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and forty horse; which small band had done good service already, and could not have been spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Governor of Byzantium, to meet him at the mouth of the River Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies

Gallies to convey him over into Greece; for which cause he took his way thither by Land, leaving to Xenophon such shipping as he had; who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed upon the confines of Heraclea, and Thracia Asatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land Country to the Propontis. The Mutiners who had landed at Calphas by night, with purpose to take spoils in Bythinia, divided themselves into ten Companies, every Captain leading his own Regiment into some Village, five or six miles from the Sea; in the greater Towns were two Regiments quartered: and so was that part of the Country surprised on the sudden, and sacked all at one time. The place of Rendezvous was an high piece of Ground, where some of them arrived, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger: two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaped, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which had slipped at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Country; and finding the Greeks laden with booty, took the advantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill whereon they encamped. One great advantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retreat from these Arcadians and Acheans, who wanting the assistance of horse, and having neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to stand meekly upon their defence, bearing off with great danger, and many wounds received, the Darts and Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driven from their watering place, and enforced to crave parly. Whatsoever the Articles of composition were, the Thracians yielded to all; but pledges for assurance they would give none, without which the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the mean time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Travellers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Army, passing along those parts: and receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly thrown themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides, them who gave him their intelligence. His horsemen he sent before to discover, and to scour the ways; the light armed footmen took the hill tops on either hand, all of them setting fire on whatsoever they found combustible: whereby the whole Country seemed to be on a light flame, to the great terror of the enemies, who thought that some huge Army had approached. That night he encamped on a hill, within five miles of the Arcadians, increasing still the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soon after supper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainly that he would have fallen upon them in the dark, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early in the next morning Xenophon coming thither in very good order, to have given battle, found that his device, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marvelled that the Greeks were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they removed at break of day, and perceived by signs that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphas, in which journey he overtook them. They embraced him and his, with great joy: confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that he should have come by night, wherein finding themselves deceived, they were afraid lest he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away to overtake him, and join with him. So they arrived at the Haven of Calphas, where it was decreed, That whoever from thenceforth made any motion to disjoin the Army, should suffer death.

§. XV.

Of divers pieces of service done by Xenophon; and how the Army returned into Greece. The occasions of the War between the Lacedemonians and the Persians.

THE Haven of Calphas lay under a goodly Head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kind of Grain and Fruits, except Olives. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very convenient Sea for a great City. All which commodities that might have allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away; fearing lest Xenophon should find some device to have settled himself and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good means to live at home; neither did they so much for hope of gain follow Cyrus in that War, as in regard of his Honour, and the love which they bare unto him: the poorer sort were (such as left their Parents, Wives and Children, to whom (through failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to return. But whether it were so that Xenophon found advantage by their own superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signs appearing in the entrails, did indeed forbid their departure; so long they were informed to abide in the place till vituals failed: neither would the Captains lead them forth to forrage the Country, until the Sacrifices should promise good success. Cherijophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heraclians, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joyned to the rest of the Army, which the greater it was, the more provision it needed, & the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Colonel in to the place of Cherijophus, would needs adventure to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoil of some Villages that stood near at hand; in which enterprize he found ill success, the whole Country lying in wait to intrap him, and an Army of Horse being set by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troops falling upon the Greeks that were scattered abroad in seeking booty, slew five hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certain Mountain thereby. The news of this overthrow coming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Army, to the rescue of those that survived, and brought them safe to the Camp upon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Army, so disheartened and unfurnished of necessities, caused the Greeks to remove their Camp to a place of more strength; which having intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to endure travel. Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to bury those which were lately slain, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their assistants. In this journey his demeanor was very honourable. For having given burial to the dead, the enemy was discovered, lying on the tops of the hills adjoining, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough & troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leave at their backs a wood scarce passable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that he had rather follow the enemy with half the number, than turn his back to them with twice as many; and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not fail with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the camp, yet what should they do there, wanting vituals to sustain them in the place, and ships to carry them away? Wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their dinners, than another day fasting; and not to regard the uneasy return, which might serve to stay Cowards from running away, but to with unto the Enemy a fair and easie way, by which he might fly from them. These persuasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Country forthwith, removing their Families, and leaving all that could not suddenly be conveyed away, to the discretion of the Greeks, who had good leisure gathered the Harvest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not only suffered quietly to enjoy the spoil of the Country, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colony on the Port of Caipas, Embassadors were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no mind to stay. Wherefore entering further into Bythinia, they took a great booty, which they carried away unto Glyryopolis, a City near unto Chalcedon, where they sold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly fear, lest their long stay in that Country might breed in them a desire to visit his Province, where they might have found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he sent to the Lacedemonian Admiral, intreating him with much instance and large promises to waite them over into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admiral confederating, promised to give the Souldiers pay, as soon as they arrived at Egyptum. So were they carried out of Asia at the treaty of the Persian, who in the height of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mighty Rivers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to surrender their Arms into his hands, and so to yield their lives to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how, to requite his injurious dealings, they seized upon Egyptum, which by Xenophon's persuasion they forbore to sack; I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertain little to the general course of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discover the secrets of Asia, and stir up the Greeks to think upon greater enterprizes, than ever their Forefathers had undertaken. Likewise

it was the only remarkable action which the time afforded. For the Roman Wars did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Towns of Italy; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedemonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seeds of the War shortly following, which the Lacedemonians made upon Artaxerxes, were already sown, before these Companies returned out of the high Countries of Asia. For the Towns of Ionis, which had sided with young Cyrus against Zissaphernes, if not against the Great King, prepared to rebel; which they thought safer, than to fall into the hands of Zissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Province, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians besought the Lacedemonians to send them aid, whereby to recover their liberties, and obtained their request. For a power was sent over, under conduct of Timbro a Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Towns as had already revolted, to secure the Cities, and their Fields, but not to make any offensive War.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Affairs of Greece, whilst they were managed by the Lacedemonians.

How the Lacedemonians took courage by example of Xenophon's Army, to make War upon Artaxerxes.

IT seems that the Lacedemonians did well perceive in how ill part Artaxerxes took their favour shewed unto his Brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open War against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care that no advantage might slip, which could serve to strengthen their Estate, by finding the Persian war beyond the Sea. But when Xenophon's Army had revealed the baseness of those effeminate Asiatics, and rehearsed the many Victories which they themselves had gotten, upon terms of extreme disadvantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of undertaking upon this huge unwieldy Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joyned forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon; and further, finding no power that was able to give them resistance, in all that long journey of four and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty five furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about four thousand two hundred fourscore and one, a very painful march of one year and three months. Nevertheless, the civil distraction, wherewith Greece was miserably torn, and especially that hot fire of the Theban War, which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth suddenly into a great flame, drew back out of Asia the power of the Lacedemonians, to the defence of their own Estate; leaving it questionable, whether Agefilas having both the fame, and far greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two years, which he spent in Asia, his deeds procured more commendation of magnanimity and fair behaviour, than of stout courage, and great or profitable achievements. For, how highly soever it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other Wars, to extol his virtue; his exploits being only a few incurious into the Countries lying near the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophon's own journey, which I know not whether any Agehath parallel'd: the famous retreat of Conon the Briton with six thousand men from Aqualeia, to his own Country, through all the breadth of Italy, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodosius, being rather like it than equal. But of Agefilas and his Wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speak more in due place.

The prosperous beginning of the War in Asia.

Timbro receiving Xenophon's men, began to take in Towns, and to entertain all such as were willing to revolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had been highly beholding to the King;

King; who seem to have had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to live under the Government of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate, as the King his Master did love him. The managing of the War begun by Themis, was for his oppressions taken out of his hands and committed to Dercyllides a Spartan, who behaved himself as a good man of War, and a wife Commander. For whereas the Rule of the low-Countries of Asia was divided between Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the Worthier man, but the other by his Princes favour the greater, and having the chief command in those Wars against the Greeks; Dercyllides, who did bear a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischievous nature, and would not be sorry to see his Corvial thoroughly beaten, though to the Kings loss) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entered Æolis, which was under the jurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Province in few daies, he brought into his own power.

That Country of Æolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gave easie successe to the attempts of Dercyllides. Zenis a Dardanian had been Deputy to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death his Wife Mania procured his Office, wherein she behaved her self so well, that the not only was beloved of the people under her Government, but enlarged her Territory, by the conquest of certain Towns adjoining; and sundry times gave assistance to Pharnabazus in his Wars against the Assians and Persians. For he had in pay some Companies of Greeks, whose valour by her good usage, did her great service. But somewhat before the arrival of Dercyllides in those parts, a Son in law of hers, called Midias, whom she trusted and loved much, being blinded with ambition, found means to fettle her, and kill her Son of seventeen years old; which done, he seized upon two of her principal Towns, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to have been admitted into possession of her whole Estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with Presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Governor in the place of Mania. His Presents were not only rejected by Pharnabazus, but revenge of his foul treason threatened, whereby the wicked villain was driven into terms of almost utter desperation. In the mean time came Dercyllides, to whom the Towns of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickly open their gates. One only Town stood out four daies (against the will of the Citizens, who were covetous of liberty) the Governor striving in vain to have kept it to the use of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities, Gergethe and Scepis, which the Traitor held; who fearing all men, as being loved of none, sent Embassadors to Dercyllides, desiring leave to speak with him, and pledges for his security: upon the delivery of which, he issued out of Scepis, and coming into the Camp, made offer to joyn with the Greeks upon such conditions as might seem reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllides, that other condition there was none, than to let the Citizens freely at liberty. And presently upon these words they marched toward Scepis. When Midias perceived that it was in vain to strive against the Army, and the Townsmen, who were all of one mind; he quietly went along with Dercyllides, who remaining but a few hours in the City, did a sacrifice to Minerva, and then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the City free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midias did not forsake his company, but followed him, earnestly entreating that he might be suffered to retain Gergethe: but coming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened, for (quoth Dercyllides) I must here likewise do a sacrifice to Minerva. The Traitor, not daring to make denial, caused his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllides, taking possession of the place, tended pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serve under his Ensigns. This done, all the goods of Mania were seized upon, as belonging to one that had been subject to Pharnabazus, who was enemy to the Greeks; and so the murderous Wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might find any place to hide his drest head. Dercyllides having in eight daies taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Erythina, to which end he took Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of War. That Winter, and the Summer ensuing, the Truce being continued, held in which time, besides the waiting of Erythina, the neck of Land joyning Cheromea to the Main, was fortified, being four or five miles in breadth; by which means eleven Towns, with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wilde Thracians, and made fit and able to victual the Camp. Likewise the City of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with provision. After this, Dercyllides had had command from Sparta to divert the War into Caria, where was the seat of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not uneasy to recover all the Towns of Ionis; Pharax the Admiral of the fleet (which was a yearly office) being appointed to joyn with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity; yet was he not in his own danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus, having respect to the Kings service, came to assist his private enemy Tissaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength, which done, they marched towards Ionis, hoping to find the Towns ill manned for resistance. As the Persians were desirous to keep the War from their own doors, so was Dercyllides willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoil and danger of the War, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the River of Meander; and not looking to have been so soon encountered, marched carelessly through the Country: when on the very sudden the whole Army of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discovered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercenary Greeks, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battel. The odds was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readines, as also in advantage of ground: for the Persians had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeks very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plain. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Handers and others, of such places as bordered upon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainly discover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wife. Only Dercyllides with his Peloponnesians, regarding their honour, prepared to endure the fight, which must needs have brought them to destruction, if the counsel of Pharnabazus had been followed; who perceiving the opportunity of so great a victory, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, began to consider, what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greeks were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to crave parley; the conclusion of which was, That a Truce should be made, to last until Tissaphernes might receive answer from the King, and Dercyllides from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were, on the one part, That all the Greeks in Asia might enjoy their own liberty and Laws; but contrariwise on the other side, That the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leave the Towns to the Kings pleasure. This Treaty was of none effect; only it served to free the Greeks from the present danger, and to gain time unto Tissaphernes, who desired to avoid the War by procrastination, which he durst not adventure to finish by trial of a battel.

§. III.

How the Lacedæmonians took revenge upon the Eleans for old displeasures. The discontent of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

IN the mean season the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, began to call the Eleans to account for some disgraces received by them during the late Wars, when leisure was wanting to the requital of such petty injuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympian Games, had let a fine upon the City of Sparta; for Non-payment of which, they forbade them to come to the solemnity; and publicly whipt one of them that was of note, for presuming to contend against their Decree. Likewise they hindered Agis King of Sparta from doing sacrifice to Jupiter; and in all points used great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no business that could hinder them from taking revenge: and therefore sent a peremptory message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at liberty the Cities which they held in subjection. This was the usual pretence, which they made the ground of all their Wars: though little they cared for the liberty of such Towns, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than mere Vassals of the Lacedæmonians. In their late Wars with Athens, the strong opposition which they found, caused this goodly Title of liberty to work very slowly: but having now to do with a State of great spirit and small force, it gave present success to their desires. Two years together they sent an Army into the Country of the Eleans: the first year an Earthquake (held in those times a prodigious sign, and which did always forbid the prosecution of any enterprise in hand) caused them to retire: the second year, all the Towns of the Eleans did hastily revolt, and the City itself was driven to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subjects freely to enjoy their liberty, and to have her own Walls thrown down. Only the Presidentship of the Olympian Games was left unto them, which it was not to be doubted that they would in time coming use modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. in this expedition all the Greeks were assistant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians and Boeotians, whose aid having been of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian War, as the force of Sparta it self, they could not smother their dislike of their unequal division following the victory; which gave to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes and Corinth, only security against Athens, but such a security as was worse than the danger. For when the equal greatness of two mighty Estates, did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutral Common-wealths to adhere to either, as the condition of their affairs required; but when, to revenge injuries, they had by mortal hatred prosecuted the War to extremity, leaving the one City naked of power and friends, the other mightily increased in both; it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatness which themselves had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to provoke it. Nevertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartans, to take occasion of any quarrel, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victory or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

§. IV.

The passage of Agesilaus into Asia. His War with Tissaphernes. How Tissaphernes was put to death; and the War diverted into another Province, through persuasion and gifts of Tithraustes his successor. How careless the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

Agesilaus newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to have the honour of the victory, which not without cause, he expected upon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Army to joyn with that of Dercyllidas, he took his way in great pomp to Aulis in Boeotia, a Haven lying opposite to the Iland of Eubœa; in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the War against Troy many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon, he meant also to do sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Country, would not permit, but saying, that the performance of such Ceremonies in that place, belonged unto their Officers; they were so unable to conceal their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw down his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himself and his Country in a new War; therefore waiting better opportunity of revenge, he quietly swallowed the contumely, and followed his main intentment. Having landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treaty of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to liberty all the Greek Towns in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the mean while make Truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought, only to win time of making provision for the War, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes, whilst Agesilaus was busie in settling the estates of his confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from war was at the coming down of these Forces which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilaus received a plain message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forthwith depart out of Asia, or make good his abode by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that he was glad to hear that his enemies had by perjury deserved vengeance from heaven, prepared to invade them; and sending word to all the Towns which lay between him and Caria, that they should provide victuals and other necessities for his Army, did easily make Tissaphernes believe, that his intent was to invade that Province wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was unfit for Horse, in which part of his Forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entered with his Horse into the plains of Meander, hoping thereby to stop the passage of a heavy foot-army, not suffering them to pass into that Country which was fittest for their service. But the Greeks left him waiting there in vain, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they took great spoil without resistance, till such time as the Horsemen of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish having the better of the Greeks, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight only twelve men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiving by that trial how hard it would be to prevail, and hold the mastery of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, took all possible care to increase that part of his forces. By which means having enabled enabled himself, whilst Winter lasted, he entered upon the Country of Tissaphernes, as soon as the season of the year would permit, and not only took a great booty, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plain of Meander, without assistance of their infantry, he gave them battle, and had a great Victory, taking their Camp, in which he found great riches. The blame of this loss fell heavily upon Tissaphernes, who either upon cowardice had abated himself from the battle, or following some other business, was then at Sardis. For which cause his Master having him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which he much desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greeks, were taken out of the way; he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and succeed him in the Government. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who lude caring to offend Heaven, when by perjury he could advance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last, through too much over-weening of his own wisdom, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himself most perfect; for supposing, that by his great skill in subtle negotiation he should one way or other circumvent the Greeks, and make them weary of Asia; he did not seek to finish the War, and, according to his Masters will, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might find some opportunity of making such end as might best stand with the Kings honour and his own. Wherein it seems that he much mistook his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aid which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly have taken it, if he could have found such means whereby the danger it self might have been avoided: as not loving to have War, whilst by any conditions (honourable, or not) he might obtain peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tithraustes took at his first possession of the low-Countries. For he sent Embassadors to Agesilaus, in very friendly sort letting him know, that the man who had been Author of the War, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greeks enjoy their own laws and liberty, upon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Army be forthwith dismissed. The answer to this proposition, was by Agesilaus referred to the Council of Sparta; in the mean season he was content to transfer the War into the Province of Pharnabazus, at the request of

This was a strange manner of War, both on the offensive, and the defensive part. For Agesilaus having entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbear his several Provinces, at the entreaty of the Lieutenants; and those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintain his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might easily be taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any loss that fell on their next Neighbour-Princes, which were subject likewise to the same Crown of Persia, so long as their own Government could be preserved from waste and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so deservedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuchs, Concubines, and ministers of pleasure, were able, by partial construction, to countenance, or disgrace, the actions of such as had the managing of things abroad; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so foolish that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Provincial Government, according to the benefit or loss, which the Country, given in charge unto each of them, received, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to pass, that as every one was desirous to make his own territory yield a large increase to the Kings treasure, if no man was careful to assist his borderers, if loss or danger might thereby grow to himself and his; but late still as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joyning their forces, it had not been unequal to recompense the spoil of one Country, by conquering another, or defending a third from far greater miseries.

§. V.

The War and Treaty between Agesilaus and Pharnabazus.

Agesilaus having thus compounded with Tithraustes, entered Phrygia, burning and wasting the Country without resistance. He took the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant drove him out of the Camp. These Actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not win Cities and Places of strength, which might have increased his power, and given assistance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew unto him some that were discontented and stood upon bad terms with the great King; whom he lost again as easily, by means of some slight injury done to them by his under-Captains. Pharnabazus did not enclose himself in any Town, for fear of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as near as he could safely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not uneasy to do. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessity, had been so great, that when he (obtaining parley) did set before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his love, (which had been such, that besides many other hazards of his person, he had for the rescue of their fleet, when it was driven to run ashore at Abydos, adventured to ride into the Seas as far as he could find any ground, and fight on Horse-back against the Athenians) together with his faith which had never been violated in word or deed: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise than by telling him, That having War with his Master, they were enforced against their will, to offend him. Agessilus did make a fair offer to him, that if he would revolt from the King to them, they would maintain him against the Persians, and establish him free Prince of the Country wherein he was at that time only Deputy to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make war against them, he would not fail to do the best that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then shift side, and betake himself to their alliance. The issue of this parley was, That the Army should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor again return into it, whilst employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agessilus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not invaded for want of more necessary business elsewhere; but because his Country would yield great booty, and for the hire of thirty Talents. By this means the Lacedæmonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards requited their unthankfulness with full revenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with gold from the Persian.

IN the mean while Tithraustes, perceiving that Agessilus meant nothing less than to return into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, took a wise course, whereby the City of Sparta was not only driven to look to her own, and give over her great hopes of subverting the Empire; but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained unto the narrow bounds of her own Territory. He sent into Greece fifty talents of silver, to be employed in raising war against the Lacedæmonians; which treasure was by the subtle practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed among the principal men of the Thebans, Argives, and Corinthians, that all those Estates having formerly borne secret hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much, as of open war. And lest this great heat of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercise, begin to faint and vanish away in idle words, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedæmonians into Arms, that they themselves might seem Authors of the quarrel. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claim; but the Phocians either having the better title, or finding the greater favour, had it adjudged unto them, and received yearly money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or persuaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning to lose their Rent, made a distress by strong hand, recovering a great deal more than their own; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) required with an invasion made upon Phocia, waiting that Country in the manner of open war. Such were the beginnings of professed hostility between Thebes & Sparta, & the first breaking out of their close enmity, that had long time, though hardly, been concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, & requesting succour, they had very favourable audience, & ready consent to their suit, it being the manner of the Lacedæmonians to defer the acknowledgment of injuries received, until occasion of revenge were offered. Then to discover their indignation in cold blood. At this time they had very good opportunity to work their

their own wills, having no other war to disturb them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no news that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countries about Phocia, and with such forces as he could levy, to attend the coming of Pausanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath been shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to revolt from Thebes. Pausanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians (who refused, to assist him in that enterprise) meaning to join with Lysander, and make a speedy end of the war. The consideration of so great a danger, approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seek what help they could abroad, forasmuch as their own strength was far too little to make resistance against such mighty preparations. It was not unknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwise affected in heart, than they durst utter in countenance; but the good wilhes of such people were little available, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should do as little hurt as they could: by which manner of tergiversation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it self on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, and make their party strong. To this end they sent Embassadors to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by public allowance, or done in time of the general war, and recompensed with friendship lately shewn in their refusal of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalf of the thirty Tyrants against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their own Honour sake, they requested them of aid in the present war, offering to do the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former estate and dignity. Thrasybulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the Thirty, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the City to make a large requital of the courtesy which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aid the Lacedæmonians in this War; but that it should assist the Thebans, and engage it self in their cause. Whilst Pausanias lay still waiting the arrival of his Confederates; Lysander being desirous to do somewhat that might advance the business in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Pausanias did not meet him, as had been appointed, yet he attempted the Town, and was slain in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this victory did encourage the Thebans, so the coming of Pausanias with his great Army did again amaze them, with precipitation of extreme danger; but their spirits were soon revived by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battle, Pausanias durst not hazard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slain, by composition, departed out of their Territory; for which, either cowardice or indifferency, he was at his return to Sparta condemned as a Traitor, and driven to flee unto Tegea, where he ended his days in banishment.

How Agessilus was called out of Asia to help his Country. A victory of the Spartans. Cannon the Athenian assisted by Pharnabazus, overcomes the Lacedæmonian Fleet; recovers the mastery of the Seas, and re-builds the walls of Athens.

THIS good success, and the confederacy made with Athens, gave such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubœans, Locrians, and Scarnians, did forthwith side with them, and raising a strong Army, determined to give battle to the Lacedæmonians as near as they might, to their own doors; considering that the force of Sparta it self was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agessilus, who readily obeyed them, and promising his friends in Asia to return speedily to their assistance, passed the Straights of Hellepont into Europe. In the mean time, the Cities of the new league had given battle to the Lacedæmonians, and the remainder of their Associates; but with ill success. For when the right wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives and Thebans returning from the chase in some disorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the victory of that day entirely their own. The reporters of this battle meeting Agessilus at Amphipolis, were by him him sent over into Asia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort unto his friend, who had since his departure seen the Spartan Fleet beaten, and Lyfander the Admiral slain. The same man, whose endeavour had brought the Athenians into order by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedæmonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the City was despoiled of her old reputation, and scarcely able to maintain an Army by Land for her defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the King his Master, to have the Greeks divided into such factions as might utterly disable them from undertaking abroad, thought it the safest way for himself, during these broils, to take such order, that he should not need any more to seek peace by intreaty and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who unprovoked, had sold his love for thirty Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight ships, who had escaped when the Fleet of Athens was surprized by Lyfander at Ægos-Potamos; giving him the command of a great Navy, wherewith he requited the loss received at Ægos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like destruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victory Conon failed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victory, so strong a Navy, and so much Gold, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their Walls, and think more hopefully upon recovering the Signiory which they had lost.

§. VIII.

Of sundry small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians lose all in Asia; the Athenians recover some part of their old Dominion.

NEVERTHELESS, the Lacedæmonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for some years the honour of their Estate, endangered very greatly by this loss at Sea. For Agessilus obtained the better with his horse-men from the Thebans, who were accounted the best riders in Greece. He walled Batia, and fought a great battle at Coronea against the Thebans and their Allies, whom he overthrew; and by his Marhall Gylis foraged the Country of Locris: which done, he returned home.

The gain of these victories was not great, and the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battle of Coronea vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposite unto them, and retired unbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agessilus charged them in the return from the pursuit. Likewise Gylis was slain with a great part of his Army by the Locrians; and some other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with equal damage, received in the parts adjoining; many Towns being easily taken, and as easily recovered. The variety of which enterprizes was such, that the Thebans themselves were drawn by the loss of the haven of Corinth, to sue for peace, but could not get audience, till such time as the news came of a great victory obtained by Iphicrates, General of the Athenian forces at Lechæum; whereupon the Theban Embassadors being sent for, and willing to do their message, required only in scorn, to have a safe conduct given them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the War was made for a while only by incursions, wherein the Acheans, Confederates of Sparta, felt much loss, their whole State being endangered by the Acarnanians; who held with the contrary side, until Agessilus repayed these invaders with equal, or greater calamities, brought upon their own Lands, which did to induce the Acarnans, that they were driven to sue for peace. But the affairs at Sea were of most consequence, upon which the success of all depended. For when the Towns of Asia perceived that the Lacedæmonians were not only intangled in a hard War at home, but almost disabled to pass the Seas, having lost their Fleet at Cnidus; they soon gave ear to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should use their own laws, if they would expell the Spartan Governours. Only the City of Abydos did stand firm, wherein Dercylidas lay, who did his best to contain all the Towns about Hellefont, in the Alliance of the Lacedæmonians; which he could not do, because the Athenian Fleet under Thrasibulus, took in Brizantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Isle of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgment of Athens.

The safe conditions offered unto the Persian by the Lacedæmonian. Of sundry fights and other passages in the War. The Peace of Antalcidas.

ABOUT this time the Spartans began to perceive how uneasy a thing it would be, to maintain the War against men as good as themselves, affixed with the treasures of Perfia: wherefore they craved peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering not only to renounce the Greeks inhabiting Asia, and to leave them to the Kings disposition; but withal, to set the Islanders, and every Town in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute liberty, whereby they said that all their principal Estates of their Country would be so weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stir against the Great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Country being so broken and rent into many small pieces, could neither have disquieted the Persian, by an offensive War, nor have made any good defence against him, but would have left it easie for him in continuance of time to have taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himself Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with envy, that perceiving how the dominion of the Seas was like to return to Athens, they chose rather to give all from themselves and others, and make all alike weak, than to permit that any of their own Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who solately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted; both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalf joyned together against the Lacedæmonians, did by their several Embassadors oppose themselves unto it; and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interposing himself to bring friends and foes on the sudden to an equality. Especially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes had sent as his Lieutenant into the low-Countries, did seek to repay the harm done by Agessilus in those parts: which his intent appearing plain, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off, Timbro was sent into Asia to make War upon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places: whereby the War being scattered about, all the Isles and Towns on the firm Land, grew almost to the manner of Pyrracy and Robbery, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance. Tim-

bro was slain by Struthas, and in his place Dilephidas was sent, who demeaned himself more warily. Dercylidas was removed from his charge at Abydos, because he had not impeached Thrasibulus in his enterprizes about Hellefont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprized and slain in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasibulus departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slain by the way at Apudus. The City of Rhodes had long before joyned with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Ariflocratie, or the Government of a few the principal Citizens; whereas contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Sovereignty into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselves by erecting in the Town of their Confederates a Government like unto their own: which doing (where more especial cause did not hinder) caused the Nobility to favour Sparta, and the Commons to incline to Athens. The people of Ægina roved upon the coast of Attica which caused the Athenians to land an Army in Ægina, and besiege their Town: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedæmonian Fleet, the Islanders began a new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships again, that returned beaten, having lost four of thirteen. The loss of these ships was soon recompensed by a victory which Chabrias the Athenian General had in Ægina, whereupon the Islanders were tain to keep home, and leave to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seem strange that the City of Athens, having but newly raised her walls, having not by any fortunate and important battle secured her estate from dangers by Land; but only depending upon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried unto different ends, had often discovered themselves irrelolute in the common cause, would send a Fleet and an Army to Cyprus, in defence of Evagoras, when the Mastery of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Island in the eye of Tyreus, had ability to vex the coast of Attica. Was the over-weening of that City did cause it usually to embrace more than it could compass; so the insolency and themselves injustice of the people, had now bred in the chief Commanders, a desire to keep themselves far out of fight, and to seek employments at such distance as might secure them from the eyes of the envious, and from publick judgments, out of which few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did pass away much part of his time in the Isle of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Country

Country could well have spared: with which he returned not when the business in Cyprus came to an end, but fought new adventures in Egypt; whereby arose neither thanks to himself, nor profit to his City, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careless of things at hand, had a notable blow given unto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, even with their own Haven. For Telentius, a Lacedæmonian, being made Governour of Agina, conceived a strong hope of surprizing the Navy of Athen, as it lay in Piræus; thinking aright, that it was a harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight, than with twenty lying in harbour, whose Mariners were asleep in their Cabbins, or drinking in Taverns. Wherefore he failed by night into the mouth of the Port, which cutting at the break of day, he found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, and few or none left aboard to make resistance: by which means he took many ships laden with merchandizes, many fisher-men, passengers, and other Vessels, also three or four Gallies; having sunk or broken, and made unserviceable, as many of the rest as the time would suffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters given to him in marriage, with whom he lived about the Courts; and many Officers that favoured the Lacedæmonians, were placed in the lower Asia; by whose assistance the Fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellepont; in such wise, that perhaps they should not have needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas, from the Great King; the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, giving freedom to all the Cities or Greece, and dividing the Country into as many several States as were petty Boroughs in it. Thus Antalcidas having bought his own peace with money, did likewise by his money become Arbitrator and decider of Controversies between the Greeks, disposing of their fortunes in such wise, as stood best with his own good. The Tenor of Antalcidas's Decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his own; the Isles of Leunor, Imbrus, and Scirus, be subject to Athen; all other Greek Towns, as well the little as the great, be set at liberty; and that whosoever should refuse this peace, upon them the approvers of it should make war, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea; the Lacedæmonians by revolt of their confederates, and the necessity of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the war, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent unto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking upon themselves the execution, did not only compel the Argives to depart out of Corinth, (which, under pretence of defending, they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leave Boeotia free, of which Province Thebes had always held the Government, the Thebans themselves being also comprehended under the name of the Boeotians; but caused the Mantineans to throw down their own City, and to dwell in Villages: alledging that they had formerly been accustomed to do so, though purposing indeed to chastise them, as having been ill-affected to Sparta in the late War. By these courtes the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the small Towns in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their wars, as Authors of their liberty; and that the great Cities having lost all their dependants, would be unable to make opposition.

The War which the Lacedæmonians made upon Olynthus. They take Acæbes by treason; and Olynthus by Famine.

WHilst these wars, which ended without either victory or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the City of Olynthus in Thrace was grown to mighty, that the did not only command her neighbour-Towns, but was also become terrible to places far removed, and to Sparta itself. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principal City of that Kingdom, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the usual pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to set at liberty the places over which King Amintas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus, and of Apollonia, being nearest unto the danger of those encroaching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedæmonians with their fear, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians, would be too strong for all Greece, if continuance of time should give it reputation, which only it wanted: wherefore they requested assistance, but in such terms as did found of compulsion, protesting that either they must war upon Olynthus, or become subject unto her, and fight in her defence.

Hereupon

Hereupon was made a hasty levy of men, two thousand being sent presently away, with promise to be seconded by a greater Army. Whilst these two thousand gave such beginning to the war, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Army following them, surprized the Citadel of Thebes, which was betrayed into the hand of Phœbidas the Lacedæmonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the slavery of their Country. The Thebans were ill-affected to Sparta, but had not in any point violated the peace lately made between them; which caused the Lacedæmonians to doubt, whether this act of Phœbidas were more worthy of reward or of punishment. In conclusion, profit so far over-weighed honesty, that the deed was approved, many principal Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driven into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the Government of the City: by whose authority, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serve the Lacedæmonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This access of power having strengthened the Lacedæmonians, caused them to entertain the greater forces about Olynthus, (which notwithstanding the loss of one great Battel, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it self unto their obedience.

§. XI.

How the Thebans recovered their liberty, driving out the Lacedæmonian Garrison.

AFTER this Olynthian War, which endured almost three years, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a means to shake off their yoke, and gave both example and means to others to do the like. One of the banished men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, coming to Athen, that the tyranny wherewith his Country was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those, who for fear of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was laid between these two, that soon found very good success, being managed thus. Seven of the banished men forsook Athen privily, and entered by night into the fields of Thebes, where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the evening to the Gates like husband-men returned from work, and so passed undiscovered unto the house of Charon, whom Phylidas the Scribe had drawn into the conspiracy. The day following, a solemn feast being then held in the City, Phylidas promised the Governours, who were insolent and lustful men, that he would convey unto them that night the most beautiful Dames of the Town, with whom they should take their pleasure. Having cheered them with such hope, and plenty of good Wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they urged) came, that he could not make good his promise, unless they would dismiss their followers, because the Gentlewomen, who attended without the Chamber, would not endure that any of the servants should see their faces. Upon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maids, brought into the place; who taking advantage of the Governours loose behaviour, flew them all upon the sudden with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their garments. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where feigning themselves to come to the Governours upon business, they got admittance, and likewise flew those which were of the Lacedæmonian faction. By the like device they brake into the Prison, flew the Gaoler, and set at liberty such as they thought meet; and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed liberty, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captain of the Castle hearing the sudden Proclamation, thought the Rebels to be stronger than indeed they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practice to discover such as would be forward upon occasion of revolting. But as soon as daylight revealed the plain truth, all the people took Arms and besieged the Castle, sending hastily to Athen for succour. The Garrison also sent for aid unto the Towns adjoining, whence a few broken troops coming to the rescue, were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side, the banished Thebans did not only make speed to assist their Country-men, but procured some Athenians to join with them, & thereby came to strengthen into the City, that the Castle was yielded, more through fear than any necessity, upon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Arms for which composition, the Captain at his return to Sparta was put to death. When the news of the doings at Thebes, and the success arrived at Sparta, an Army was raised forthwith, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recovering of that City, as if some part of their ancient Inheritance had been taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a Town,

Town perfidiously usurped by them, restored to her own liberty. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this Expedition, who having wearied his followers with a toilsome Winters journey, returned home without any good or harm done; leaving Sphodrias, with part of his Army, at Thebes, to insult the Thebans; who doing them some displea-

tures, made large amends by a foolish attempt upon the Haven of Athens; which failing to take, he wasted the Country adjoining, and drove away Cattel, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the war, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how they might possibly withdraw themselves.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing Estate of Thebes, from the Battel of Leuctra, to the Battel of Mantinea.

How Thebes and Athens joyned together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The Battel of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatness.

THE Lacedæmonians were men of great resolution, and of much gravity in all their proceedings; but one dishonourable Rule they held, That all respects withstanding the commoity of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which Doctrine, even by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate: but when it was put in execution by intemperate over-weening men, it seldom failed to bring upon them, instead of profit unjustly expected, both shame and loss. And so it betell them in these enterprizes of Phæbidas, upon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias, upon the Piræus. For, howsoever Agessilaus did spoil the Country about Thebes, in which he spent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good success of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise began to look abroad, sailing to the Isle of Cercyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and having in some fights at Sea prevailed, began, as in the Peloponnesian War, to surround Peloponnesus with a Navy; afflicting so the Lacedæmonians, that, had not the Thebans by their insolvency wearied their friends, and caused them to seek for peace, it had been very likely that the end of this War, should have come to a good end, which nevertheless, being prosecuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the City of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginnings found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroached every day upon her weak Neighbours, not sparing such as had been dependants upon Athens, and finding themselves, whilst engaged in such a War, unable to relieve their complaining friends, resolved to settle the affairs of Greece, by renewing that form of peace which Amicleus had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Mellicgers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it was their intent to finish the War, to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; who readily descended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treaty of Peace: which came to pass, being wrought by the courageous wisdom of Eparinondas, who understood it far better than his Countrymen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treaty the Lacedæmonians and Athenians did soon agree; but when the Thebans offered to swear to the Articles in the name of the Boeotians, Agessilaus required them to swear in their own name, and to leave the Boeotians free, whom they had lately reduced under their obedience. Whereunto Eparinondas made answer, That the City of Sparta should give example to Thebes by setting the Laconians free; for that the Signior of Boeotia did by as good right appertain to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken; but was heard with no patience: for Agessilaus bearing a vehement hatred unto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawn back out of Athens into Greece, and disappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to achieve by the Persian War, did now passionately urge that point of setting the Boeotians at liberty; and finding it as obstinately refused, he dashed the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta, lay in Phocæ, who received command from the Governors of Sparta forthwith to enter upon the Land of the Thebans with all his power; which he did, and was there slain at Leuctra, and with him the Flower of his Army. This Battel of Leuctra, being one of the most famous that ever were fought between the Greeks, was not so notable for any circumstance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight itself, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta; but especially, for that after this Battel (between which and the conclusion of the general Peace, there passed but twenty days) the Lacedæmonians were never able to recover the strength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted far and near: whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it self unto the little Region of Boeotia, did now begin to undertake the leading and command of many people and estates, in such wise, that soon after they brought an Army of threecoae and ten thousand strong unto the Gates of Sparta. So much do the afflictions of an hard War, valiantly endured, advance the affairs of the distressed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxury, retchlessness, and many other vices or vanities, made rusty and effeminate.

§. II.

How the Athenians took upon them to maintain the Peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. Eparinondas invades and wrests the Territory of Lacedæmon.

THE Athenians refusing to take advantage of this overthrow fallen upon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedæmonians, did nevertheless finely give them to understand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking upon themselves the maintenance of the Peace lately concluded, which Agessilaus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrels that might arise) had left unperfected, they assembled the Deputies of all the estates confederated at Athens; where the general liberty of all Towns, as well small as great, was ratified under the title of the Athenians, and their associates. Hereupon began fresh garboils. The Mantineans, claiming power by this Decree to order their affairs at their own pleasure, did (as it were) in despite of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their Town, re-edifie it, and allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondency with the Lacedæmonians; some to weaken and keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedæmonians durst not give impeachment to the Mantineans, nor take upon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, and each party called in foreign help. Then was an Army sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegæ, against the Mantineans; but indeed against them both. Agessilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, and many others; with the power of which Countries they entred Peloponnesus in favour of the Arcadians, who had, upon expectation of their coming, obtained from giving Battel to Agessilaus. The Army of the Spartans being dismissed, and Eparinondas joyned with the Arcadians, the Region of Laconia was invaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could have found belief if any had foretold it. Almost 600 years were spent, since the Dorians, under the posterity of Hercules, had seized upon Laconia; in all which time the found of an Enemies Trumpet were not heard in that Country. Ten years were not fully past, since all Greece was at the devotion of the Spartans; but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Army could once look upon, nor the mighty forces of Athens, and other enemy-States had dared to set foot on, saving by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoke whereof the women of Sparta were athwart to behold. All which indignity notwithstanding, the Lacedæmonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preserve the Town, setting at liberty as many of their Heilotes or Slaves, as were willing to bear Arms in defence of the State, and somewhat pitifully entreated the Athenians, to give them succour. From Corinth, and some Towns of Peloponnesus, they received speedy assistance: the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epimanolas returned without battle, having rebuilt the City of Messene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedæmonians many ages before had chased away to other Countries, possessing their Territories themselves.

§. III.

The Composition between Athens and Sparta for command in War against the Thebans; who again invade and spoil Peloponnesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

THIS journey therefore utterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, unto Athen, they offered to yield the Admiralty to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generals by Land. This had been a composition well agreeing with the situation and quality of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no mark or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot, whereof the Land-Army was compounded; who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athen, were to have served under the Lacedæmonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authority should be divided by time, the Athenians ruling five days, the Lacedæmonians other five, and so successively that each of them should have command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vain ambition was more regarded than the common profit, which must of necessity be very slowly advanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second invasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so unable to impeach them, that having fortified Strophus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driven out of their strength by Epaminondas, who foraged the Country without resistance. But as the Articles of this league between Athen and Sparta did, by dividing the conduct in such manner, disable the Society, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanity. For the Arcadians considering their own numbers which they brought into the field, and having found by many trials that their people were not inferior to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Souldierthip, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the Government, with their friends the Thebans; and not always continue followers of others, by increasing whose greatness they should strengthen their own yoke. Hereupon they began to demean themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hateful to their Neighbours, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For, a motion of general peace having been made (which took not effect, because the City Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedæmonians) the next enterprize of the Spartans and their friends was upon these Arcadians, who relying too much upon their own worth, were overthrown in a great battle, their calamity being as pleasing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

§. IV.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greeks to the Persians; with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitless issue of the Embassages.

THE Thebans, especially rejoiced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that without their aid, the success of all enterprizes proved so ill; whereas they themselves had by their own power accomplished very well whatever they took in hand, and were become not only victorious over the Lacedæmonians, but Patrons over the Thessalonians, and moderators of great quarrels that had risen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdom, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the Son of Amintas, and father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage unto Thebes. Having therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought means of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassador the great and famous Captain Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant unto the Thebans all that they desired, whereof two especial points were, That Messene should remain free from the Lacedæmonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their ships of War to Sea; only the latter of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further advice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadors at the same time, of whom few or none received much contentment. For the King having found by long experience, how far it concerned him to maintain a sure party in Greece, did upon many weighty considerations resolve to bind the Thebans firmly unto him; justly expecting, that their greatness should be on that side his own security. The Athenians had been ancient Enemies to his Crown; and having turned the profit of their victories upon the Persians to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signiory in such puffed manner, that (undry grievous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible War, wherein the Lacedæmonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aid by Darius Nothus, were not able to vanquish them till their own indifference brought them on their knees. The Lacedæmonians being victorious over Athen, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertook the Conquest of Asia, from which though by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called back, yet having renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not unlikely, that they should upon the next advantage have pursued the same enterprize, had not they been impeached by this Theban War. But the Thebans contrariwise had always discovered a good affection to the Crown of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his invasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedæmonians against Athen: And finally, having offered much contumely to Agessians when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making War on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deservings, they were no Seamen, and therefore unlikely to look abroad; whereupon if perchance they should have any desire; yet were they disabled by the want of good Haven-Towns; which they could not seize upon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving liberty to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend unto the requests of Pelopidas, as farforth as he might, without giving open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that mean he purchased his own quiet, being never afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill means which the Greeks had to disturb Artaxerxes, was very beneficial to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the affairs of Greece been so composed, that any one City might without empage of the rest have transported an Army to assist the revolting Satrapes, or Vice-royes of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Assyria, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphylia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phœnicia; humane reason can hardly find the means, by which the Empire could have been preserved from that ruin, which the Divine Counsel had deferred unto the days of Alexander. But this great Conspiracy of so many large and wealthy Provinces, wanting a firm body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space dissolved, and vanished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiatics, wearied quickly with the travels and dangers incident to War, forsaking the common cause, and each man striving to be the first, that by treason to his company should both redeem the former treason to his Prince, and purchase withal his own promotion with increase of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I have rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; but for that it was like a sudden storm, rashly commenced, idly followed, and foolishly laid down, having made a great noise without effect, and having small reference to any other action agreeable; as also because in the whole reign of Artaxerxes, from the War of Cyrus to the invasion of Egypt, I find nothing (this insurrection, and a fruitless journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention, much less of digression from the course of the business in Greece. All, or the most of his time passed away so quietly, that he enjoyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could afford unto such an absolute Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were only, or chiefly, Domesticall; growing out of the hatred which Parysatis the Queen-Mother bare unto his wife Stasira, and to such as had been the greatest enemies to her Son Cyrus, or gloried in his death: upon whom, when by poison and feminine practices he had satisfied her mischievous appetite of revenge, thenceforth she wholly applied herself to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the lewd desire of marrying his own Daughter, and filling him with the perurbation, which Princes not endued with an especial grace, do readily entertain; That his own will was the supreme law of his subjects, and the rule by which all things were to be measured and adjudged to be good or evil. In this imaginary happiness Pelopidas, and the other Embassadors of Greece, both found and left him; but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of this Treaty with them, being altogether to his own advantage, did seem to promise, if not the perpetuity, a long endurance of the same felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a full security of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternity laid by mortal men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heaven, or made vain and unprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadors to the Perſian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Towns, as well the little as the great, should be set at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Judges of all Controversies that might arise, and Leaders in War of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings letters being solemnly published at Thebes; in the presence of Embassadors drawn thither from all parts of Greece: when an oath was required for observation of the form of peace therein set down, a dilatory answer was made by the Embassadors, who said, that they were sent to hear the articles, not to swear unto them. Hereby the Thebans were driven to send unto each of the Cities to require the Oath; but in vain. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, that they did not need it; others took courage by their example to do the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gave neither addition nor confirmation of greatness, but left them as it found them to rely upon their own swords.

§. V.

How all Greece was divided between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults arising in Arcadia.

THE condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each upon envy of the others greatness drawn all their followers into a cruel and intestine War, by which the whole Country, and especially the

Estates of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoin their forces against the Thebans, who fought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the party of these ancient Governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits received, or in dislike of those, who by strong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authority they could not suddenly aspire without some injury and much envy. The City of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessity had made warlike, and many Victories in few years had filled with great spirits; and being so mighty independents, that she had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponnesus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beside, excepted) under such acknowledgement, as wanted not much of meer Vassalage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already she had set good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argives had been always bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobility Superiors, but were far under them in valour, having been often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of losing all: which caused them to suspect and envy nothing more than the greatness and honour of Sparta, taking truce with her when she was at rest, and had leisure to bend her whole force against them; but firmly joining with her enemies whenever they found her entangled in a difficult War. As the Argives were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes, so the Arcadians, transported with a great opinion of their own worthiness, had formerly renounced and provoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedæmonians, and were now become very doubtful adherents to the Thebans. In which regard, it was thought convenient by Epaminondas and the State of Thebes, to send an Army into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wavering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutral, or which was to be feared, open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens, which was very strange, and seemed no less to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firm league with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadians treated with them, did nevertheless accept this new Confederacy, not relinquishing the old, because they found that howsoever these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedæmonians, they should hereby herby be drawn somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was unlikely to invade Peloponnesus with a strong Army. But this did rather hasten, than by any means stay the coming of Epaminondas; who finding the way somewhat more clear for him (because the City of Corinth, which lay upon the Isthmus, and had been adverse to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grievous War, driven to become Neutral) took occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Army, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated money, which many principal men among them had laid hands on, under pretence of employing it to publick uses. In compounding the differences grown upon this occasion, such as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captain of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countrymen, as people desirous of innovation. This was done, but the uproar thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forthwith enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Arms, with much ado scarce pacified. When complaint of the Captains proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame upon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them to judge of their fidelity, by the assistance which they should give him, in that War which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aid of so mighty a power as he drew along with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to be made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before sought means to settle the affairs of their Country, by drawing things to some good conclusion of peace, did now forthwith send to Athens for help, and with all dispatched some of the principal among them as Embassadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now ready to be invaded. This Embassy brought much comfort to the Lacedæmonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew, that all their forces, and best provisions, would be no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatives, they (who had been accustomed unto such a supremacy, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerful City of Athens, till other hope of securing their own Estate could not be thought upon) did now very gently yield to the Arcadians, that the command of the Army in chief, should be given for the time, to that City in whose Territory it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible Invasion of Peloponnesus by Epaminondas.

CERTAIN it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firm consent, and uniform care of the common safety. For, beside the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives and Messenians prepared with all their strength to join with Epaminondas, who having been a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, received their intelligence, that the Army coming from Athens would pass by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which City, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forthwith declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be upon such of the Arcadians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedæmonian Captains to fortify Mantineia with all diligence, and to send for Agessilaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men which remained in the Town, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held so good espial upon his Enemies, that, had not an unknown fellow brought hasty advertisement of his purpose to Agessilaus, who was then well onward in the way to Mantineia, the City of Sparta had suddenly been taken. For thither with all speed and secrecy did the Theban march, who had surely carried the City, notwithstanding any defence that could have been made by that handful of men remaining within it, but that Agessilaus in all flying haste got into it with his Companies, whom the Army of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast it was able. The arrival of the Lacedæmonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas, of taking Sparta, so it presented him with a fair advantage upon Mantineia. It was the time of Harvest, which made it very likely, that the Mantineans, finding the War to be carried from their walls into another quarter, would use the commodity of that vacation, in titching in their Corn, and turning out the Cattel into the fields, whilst no enemy was near, that might impeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantineia, sending sending his horsemen before him, to seize upon all that might be found without the City. The Mantineans (according to the expectation of Epimanondas) were scattered abroad in the Country, far more intent upon their Harvest business, than upon the war, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattel, being unable to recover the Town, were in a desperate case; and the Town it self in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy should have taken all their provision of victuals, with so many of the people as had not over-dearly been redeemed, by that Cities returning to society with Thebes. But at the same time, the Athenians coming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to have found at Mantineæ were very earnestly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any courageous adventure to deliver those who their wife were given as lost. The Thebans were known at that time to be the best Souldiers of all the Greeks, and the commendation of good Horsemanship had always been given to the Thebans, as excelling in that quality all other Nations; yet the regard of honour so wrought upon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their City, which had entered into this War upon no necessity of her own, but only in desire of relieving her distressed friend, they issued forth of Mantineæ, not abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their Horses, with meat; and giving a bruly charge upon the enemy, who as bravely received them, after a long and hot fight, they remained Masters of the field, giving by this Victory a safe and easie retreat to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Boeotians arrived in the place soon after this Battel, whom the Lacedæmonians and their assistants were not far behind.

Epimanondas, considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprizing Sparta and Mantineæ having failed, the impression of terror which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soon vanquish, unless by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, and leave some memorable character of his Expedition, resolved to give them Battel, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtful affections of his own Associates, and to leave the Spartans as weak in spirit and ability, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that Battel, wherein Victory should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacrity of his Souldiers to be such as promised the accomplishment of his own desire; he made shew of declining the enemy, and entrenching himself in a place of more advantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heat of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when he should come upon them unexpected. This opinion deceived him not. For with very much tumult, as in so great and sudden a danger, the enemy ran to Arms, necessity enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that days service, urging them to do as well as they might. The Theban Army consisted of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lacedæmonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the War was in their Country) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedæmonians; the Athenians had the left wing; the Achaans, Eleans, and others of less account, filled the body of the Army. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their own Battel, opposite to the Lacedæmonians, having by their sides the Arcadians, the Eubæans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Acæsiensians, and Thebessians, with others, compounding the main Battel; the Argives held the right wing, the horsemen on each part were placed in the flanks, only a troop of the Eleans were in the rear. Before the footmen could joyn, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who, not yielding to the enemy either in courage or skill, were overlaid with numbers, and so beaten upon by Thebessians slings, that they were driven to forsake the place, and leave their infantry naked. But this retreat was the less disgraceful, because they kept themselves together, and did not fall back upon their own footmen; but finding the Theban horse to have given them over, and withal discovering some Companies of foot, which had been sent about by Epimanondas, to charge their Battel in the rear, they brake upon them, routed them, them, and hewed them all in pieces. In the mean season the Battel of the Athenians had not only to do with the Argives, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horsemen, in such wise that it began to open, and was ready to turn back, when the Elean Squadron of Horse came up to the relief of it, and restored all on that part. With far greater violence did the Lacedæmonians and Thebans meet, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour; so that equal courage, and equal loss on both sides made the hope and appearance of Victory to either equally doubtful: unless perhaps the Lacedæmonians being very firm abiders, might seem the more likely to prevail, as having born the first brunt and fury of the onset, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by discipline, as it were by Nature, to excel in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few years, cannot be thought to have gotten a habit so sure and general. But Epimanondas perceiving the obdurate stiffness of the Enemies to be such, as neither the bad success of their own horse, nor all the force of the Boeotian Army, could abate so far, as to make them give one foot of ground; taking a choice company of the most able men, whom he cast into the form of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the advantage of that figure against a Squadron, and by his own exceeding virtue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their ranks, and cleave the whole Battel in despite of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who may justly be said to have carried the Victory, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the Battel was fought, having driven the Enemy to lodge farther off. For that which was alleged by the Athenians, as a token that the Victory was partly theirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries upon whom they lighted by chance in their own flight, finding them behind their Army, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a ceremony remarkable only among the Greeks, and served merely for ostentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtained somewhat, which the enemy could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the general immediate end of the battel; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is expressed from them, who forsook the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for trial of their ability and prowess. This was the last work of the incomparable virtue of Epimanondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troop of men, which broke the Lacedæmonians Squadron, and forced it to give back in disorder, was furiously charged on the sudden, by a desperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, he nevertheless, with a singular courage, maintained the fight, using against the enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his own body; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, he received so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the iron and piece of the truncheon in his breast. Hereupon he sunk down, and was soon conveyed out of the fight by his friends; having by his fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who till now would have got his body) but much more inflamed with revengeful indignation, the Thebans, who raging at his heavy mischance, did with great laughter compel their disordered enemies to leave the field; though long they followed not the chase, being wearied more with the sadness of this disaster, than with all the travel of the day. Epimanondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Physicians, that when the head of the Dart should be drawn out of his body, he must needs dye. Hearing this, he called for his shield, which to have lost, was held a great dishonour: It was brought unto him. He bade them tell him, which part had the Victory; answer was made, that the Boeotians had won the field. Then said he, It is a fair time for me to dye; and withal sent for Tolidas and Diophantos, two principal men of War, that were both slain; which being told him, he advised the Thebans to make peace, whilst with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a General. Herewithal he willed, that the head of the weapon should be drawn out of his body, comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of issue, by telling them, that the Victories of Leuctra and Mantineæ were two fair daughters, in whom his memory should live.

So died Epimanondas, the worthiest man that ever was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Country: for he equalled all others in the several virtues, which in each of them were singular. His Justice and Sincerity, his Temperance, Wisdom, and high Magnanimity, were no way inferior to his Military virtue; in every part whereof he so excelled, that he could not properly be called a Warrior, a Valiant, a Politick, a Bountiful, or an Indultrious, and a Provident Captain, Neither was his private conversation unanswerable to those high parts, which gave him praise abroad. For he was Grave, and yet very Affable and Courteous; resolute in publick business, but in his own particular easie, and of much mildness: a lover of his people, bearing with mens infirmities, witty and pleasant in speech, far from insolence. Master of his own affections, and furnished with all qualities that might win and keep love. To these graces were added great ability of body, and much Eloquence, and very deep knowledge in all parts of Philosophy and Learning, wherewith his mind being enlightened, rested not in the sweetness of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gave unto Thebes, which had evermore been an underling, a dreadful reputation among all people adjoining, and the highest command in Greece.

§. VIII.

Of the Peace concluded in Greece after the Battel of Mantineia. The Voyage of Agellius into Egypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made between him and Pompey the Roman.

THIS Battel of Mantineia was the greatest that had ever been fought in that Country between the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Plataea, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gave rather a great fame, than a hard trial to the Grecian valour; neither were the practice of Arms and Art Military, so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian War, as long continuance, and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted, which were undertaken against foreign enemies, proving for the most part unfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interested, which never had more able souldiers and brave Commanders, nor ever contended for Victory with greater care of the success, or more obstinate resolution. All which, notwithstanding, the issue being such as hath been related, it was found best for every particular Estate, that a general Peace should be established, every one retaining what he presently had, and none being forced to depend upon another. The Messians were by name comprized in this new league; which caused the Lacedaemonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindred not the rest from proceeding to conclusion, considering that Sparta was now too weak to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it self in execution. This Peace, as it gave some breath and refreshing to all the Country, so to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it afforded leisure to seek after wealth by foreign employment in Egypt, whither Agellius was sent with some small Forces to assist, or indeed, as a Mercenary, to serve under Tachos King of Egypt in his War upon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a Voluntary, with such Forces as he could raise, by entreaty, and offer of good pay, to the same service. These Egyptian Kings descended from Amyrtaeus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius Nathus, having retained the Country, notwithstanding all intestine dissensions, and foreign invasions, during three Generations of their own race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greeks, that by their help (easily procured with gold) they conceived great hope, not only to assure themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adjoining, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprize might have been, had it not fallen by Domesticall Rebellion, it is uncertain. But very likely it is, that the Rebellion on it self had soon come to nothing, if Agellius had not proved a false Traytor, joyning with Neithanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebel with that Army which the money of Tachos had waged. This falshood Agellius excused, as tending to the good of his own Country, though it seem rather, that he grudged because the King took upon himself the conduct of the Army, using his service only as Lieutenant, who had made full account of being appointed the General. Howsoever it came to pass, Tachos being shamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had reposed his chief confidence, fled unto the Persian, who upon his submission gave him gentle entertainment; and Neithanebus (who seems to have been the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set up another King; to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yielded their obedience. But Agellius fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed so far, that he left Neithanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdom; who in recompence of his Treason to the former King Tachos, and good service done to himself, rewarded him with two hundred and thirty Talents of silver, with which booty failing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, valiant, and a good Leader in War, free from covetousness, and not reproached with any blemish of lust; which praises are the less admirable in him; for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endue every one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent stream of an ill nature) with all, or the chief of these good qualities. He was nevertheless very arrogant, perverse, unjust and vain-glorious; measuring all things by his own will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The Expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be overthrown; with which conceit being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans and their Allies, he did ever after bear such hatred unto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meer necessity to grow warlike, and able, to the utter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable loss of all her former greatness. The commendations given to him by Xenophon his good friend, have caused Plutarch to lay his name in the balance against Pompey the great; whose actions (the solemn gravity of carriage excepted) are very disproportionate. Yet we may truly say, That as Pompey made great Wars under sundry Climates, and in all the Provinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of employments all that were before him; so Agellius had at one time or other some quarrel with every Town in Greece, had made a War in Asia, and medled in the business of the Egyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predecessors: yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey never took. Herein also they were very like; Each of them was the last great Captain which his Nation brought forth in time of liberty, and each of them ruined the liberty of his Country by his own Lordly wilfulness. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quam paria; the resemblance was nearer than the equality. Indeed the freedom of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cesar, whom he had intreated to take Arms; yet the Roman Empire stood, the form of Government only being changed: But the liberty of Greece, or Sparta it self, was not forfeited unto the Thebans, whom Agellius had compelled to enter into a Victorious War; yet the Signiory, and ancient renown of Sparta was presently lost, and the freedom of all Greece being wounded in the Theban War, and after much blood lost, ill healed by the Peace ensuing, did very soon, upon the death of Agellius, give up the ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Country was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporary passages of things, in any other Nation.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD.

Intreating of the Times from the Reign of Philip of Macedon, to the Establishing of that Kingdom in the Race of Antigonus.

THE FOURTH BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of Philip the Father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon.

What Kings Reigned in Macedon before Philip.

HE Greeks of whom we have already made large discourse, not as yet wearied with intestine War, nor made wise by their vain contention for superiority, do still, as in former times, continue the invasion and vastation of each other.

Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the world, they defended their liberty, with as happy success as ever Nation had, and with no less honour, than hath ever been acquired by deeds of Arms. And having had a trial and experience more than fortunate, against those Nations, they so little regarded what might come from them, who had so often forfeited the reputation of their Forces, as whatsoever could be spared from their own distraction at home, they transported over the Hellaspont, as sufficient, to entertain and baffle them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with every man of mark in the world, that they underfall, and perish by the hands and harms which they least fear; so fared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speak) they had so little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each other, when the fast-growing greatness of such a Neighbour-King; should, in regard of their own safeties, have served them for a strong argument of union and accord. But the glory of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampered and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which fate nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakened them, and won upon them, that they were not (as the Grecians per(waded themselves) in any one age, likely to recover their own, much less to work any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosophy to consider, That all great alterations are, storm-like, sudden and violent; and that it is then over-late to repair the decayed and broken banks, when great rivers are once swollen, fast-running, and enraged. No, the Greeks did rather employ themselves, in breaking down those defences which stood between them and this inundation, than seek to rampire and re-enforce their own fields, which by the Level of reason they might have found to have lien under it. It was therefore well concluded by Orosius: Græciæ Civitates imperare singule cupiunt, imperium omnes perdidērunt; The Cities of Greece lost their command, by striving each of them to command all.

The Kingdom of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the son of Osiris, or, as other Authors affirm, of Jupiter and Æthra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Ægean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west by Thessaly and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the family of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by Nation Argives; who are listed as followeth. About some six years after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Ambaces then governing Medea; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle to lead a Colony into Macedon, departed thence with many people: and as he was marching through that Countrey, the weather being rainy and tempestuous, he espied a great herd of Goats, which fled the storm as fast as they could, halting them to their known place of covert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to mind, that he had also by another Oracle been directed, to follow the first troop of beasts, that should either lead him, or flie before him; he pursued these Goats to the Gates of Edassia, and being undiscovered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darkness of the air, he entered their City without resistance, and possessed it. Soon after this, by the overthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twenty years. Caranus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelve years. Tyrinus followed Caranus, and ruled eight and twenty years.

Perdiccas the first, the son of Tyrinus governed one and fifty years: a Prince, for his great valour and many other virtues, much renowned: Solinus, Pliny, Justine, Em-Solin, Scabius, Theophilus, Antiochennus, and others, Ptolemy, Strabo, Herodotus, affirm, that he appointed a place of burial for himself, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successors, at Age: assuring them, that the Kingdom should so long continue in his Line and Race, as they continued to lay up their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posterity of the Temenedæ failed in him: a thing rather devised after the effect, as I conceive, than foretold by Perdiccas.

Argens succeeded unto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twenty years.

Philip the first, his successor, reigned eight and twenty years.

Æropus followed Philip, and governed six and twenty years: in whose infancy the Illyrians invaded Macedon, and having obtained a great victory, they pursued the same to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resolving either to recover their former loss or to lose at once both their Kingdom and their King, they carried him with them in his cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten, (their King being present) or rather they perwaded themselves that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their natural Lord, being an Infant, and no way (but by the hands of his servants) able to defend himself from destruction. The like is reported by Aimoneus of Clotarins the son of Fredegunda.

Alcetas succeeded Æropus, and ruled nine and twenty years.

Amyntas the first, succeeded Alcetas, and reigned fifty years; He lived a such time as Darius Hystaspes, after, his unprosperous return out of Seythia, sent Megabazus with an Army into Europe, who in Darius name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yielding unto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadors, as you have heard before, were for their infant behaviour toward the Macedonian Ladies, slain by the direction of Alexander, who was the son of Amyntas, and his Successor.

Alexander firnamed the Rich, the son of Amyntas, governed Macedon three and forty years. He did not only appease the wrath of Alcibades, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadors by giving Gyges his Sister, to Eubares of the blood of Persia; but by that match he grew so great in Xerxes grace, as he obtained all that Region between the Mountains of Olympus and Hemus, to be united to the Kingdom of Macedon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greeks. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Artabanus made General of the Persian Army; Alexander acquainted the Greeks with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three sons, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip.

Perdiccas the second, the son of Alexander, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian Wars, and reigned in all eight and twenty years. The wars which he made were not much remarkable: the Story of them is found here and there by pieces in Thucydides his first six Books. He left behind him two sons; Perdiccas, who was very young; and Archelaus, who was base-born.

Perdiccas the third, being delivered to the custody and care of Archelaus, was at seven years of age cast into a well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excusing this fact to Cleopatra the Mother of the young King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily, fell thereinto by misadventure. But Archelaus stayed not here: for having thus dispatched his brother, he slew both his Uncle Alcetas the son of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the son of this Alcetas, his Cousin German, and enjoyed the Kingdom of Macedon himself four and twenty years.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though he made himself King by wicked murder, yet performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he fought by all means to draw Socrates unto him, and that he greatly loved and honoured Eurypius the Tragedian. He had two sons, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his Father; and having reigned seven years, he was slain in hunting, either by chance, or of purpose, by Crates.

Orestes his younger son was committed to the education of Propus, of the Royal blood of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupil; for Propus murdered him and usurped the Kingdom; which he held some six years: the same who denied passage to Agellaus King of Sparta, who desired, after his return from the Asian expedition, to pass by the way of Macedon into Greece.

This Usher left three sons, Pausanias, Argens, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his father Æropus, and having reigned one year, he was driven out by Amyntas the son of Philip, the son of the first Perdiccas, the son of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preserved, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his Brother Perdiccas, his Uncle Alcetas, and his son Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very unquietly) four and twenty years; for he was not only infected by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians, and by his Brother Argens, encouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argens, for two years dispossest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbours near the Ægean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chief City of Macedon.

Amyntas the second, had by his wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three sons; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great: and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione. He had also by his second wife Gyges, three Sons; Archelaus, Argens, and Meneleus, afterward slain by their Brother Philip. He had more by a Concubine, Pholomy firnamed Alorites, of the City of Alorus, wherein he was born.

Alexander the second reigned not much above one year, in which time he was invaded by Pausanias, the son of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great sum of money) to leave his youngest brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his Father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander being invited by the Alcades against Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in Thessaly, having redeemed his brother Philip, to draw the Thracians to his assistance, entered into Confederacy with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Country, with whom he also left Philip with divers other principal persons, for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother falling in love with her Son in Law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Exione, practised the death of Alexander her son, with a purpose to confer the Kingdom on her Paramour, which Pholomy Alorites did put in execution: by means whereof, he held Macedon for three years, but was soon after slain by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodore hath hath it otherwise of Philip being made pledge; and faith, That Amyntas his Father delivered him for hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conveyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his Father was yet living) was first ingaged to the Thracians, and delivered for hostage a second time by Alexander his brother.

Perdiccas the third, after he had slain Alorites his base Brother, governed Macedon five years, and was then slain in a Battel against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Justin affirmeth, that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his Mother, as Alexander did.

§. II.

The beginning of Philip's Reign: and how he delivered Macedon from the troubles wherein he found it intangled.

Philip the second, the youngest son of Amyntas by Eurydice, having been instructed in all knowledge requisite unto the Government of a Kingdom, in that excellent education which he had under Epinomachus, making an escape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the first year of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourscore and thirteen years: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdom was invironed, he took on him, not as a King (for Perdiccas left a son, though but an Infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of War. Yet his fruitful ambition soon over-grew his modesty, and he was easily per-suaded by the people to accept both the title of King, and withal, the absolute rule of the Kingdom. And, to say the truth, the necessity of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. For, besides the incursions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set up in opposition, Pausanias the Athenians, Argens the son of the late Usurper, Æropus: each of their labouring to place in Macedon a King of their own election. These heavy burdens when Philip could not well bear, he bought off the weightiest by money, and by fair promises unloaded himself of so many of the rest, as he ran under the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with four thousand Macedonians, beside those that were wounded and taken prisoners; and that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a Fleece by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land under Mantias, did beat upon him on all sides and quarters of his Country: yet after he had practised the men of War of Pannonia, and corrupted them with gifts; and had also bought the King of Thrace from Pausanias, he forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies; and, for the first, he prevented their recovery of Amphipolis, a City on the frontier of Macedon: and did then pursue Argens, the son of Æropus, set against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heels, in his retreat from Æges, that he forced him to abide the battel: which Argens lost, having the greatest part of his Army slain in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others which remained unbroken, took the advantage of a strong piece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet avoiding thereby the present fury of the Souldiers, they obtained of the Vanquishers life and liberty to return into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded between him and the Athenians for that present, and for this clemency he was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greeks.

§. III.

The good success which Philip had in many enterprises.

Now had Philip leisure to look Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pannonians, his irreconcilable Enemies and borderers: both which he invaded with so prosperous success, as he slew Bardilis, King of the Illyrians, with seven thousand of his Nation, and thereby recovered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon: and withal, upon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierc'd that Country, and after a main Victory obtained, he enforc'd them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done, than (without staying to take longer breath) he halted speedily towards Larissa, upon the River Peneus in Thessaly, of which Town he soon made himself Master; and thereby he got good footing in that Country, wherof he made use in time following. Now although he resolved either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his own against all others, because the horse men of that Country were the best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it most for his safety to close up the entrances out of Thrace, lest while he invaded Thessaly and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or over-run Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous river of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon: and won it. He also recovered Pyndia, and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenider (sometime Datus) and called it after his name, Philippi: to the people whereof, Saint Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philips affairs, he drew yearly a thousand talents, which make fix hundred thousand French Crowns.

And that he might with the more ease disburden the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had given a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entered into league with his Fathers malicious enemies, the Olynthians; whom the better to falten unto him, he gave them the City of Pyndia with the territory, meaning nothing less than that they should enjoy it, or their own Estate, many years.

Now that he might by degrees win ground upon the Greeks, he took the fair occasion to deliver the City of Pheres in Thessaly, from the Tyrants Lycophon and Tisiphonus: who, after they had conspired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who usurped upon the liberty of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philips they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former liberty. Which act of Philips did for ever after falten the Thessalians unto him, and, to his exceeding great advantage, binde them to his service.

§. IV.

Of the Phocian War which first drew Philip into Greece.

About this time, to wit, in the second year of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight years after the Battel of Mantineia, and about the eighth year of Artaxerxes Ochus, began that War, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concur towards the execution of eternal providence, and of every great alteration in the World, there is some preceding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this revengeful hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with half a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greeks themselves, beating down their own defences, to give him an easy passage; and beating themselves, to give him Victory without peril; left nothing unperformed towards their own slavery, saving the title and imposition. Of this War the Thebans (made over-proud by their Victory at Leuctra) were the inflamers. For at the Council of the Amphictiones, or of the general Estates of Greece, in which at that time they wayed most, they caused both the Lacedaemonians and Phocians to be condemned in greater sums of money than they could well bear; the one for surprizing the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing up a piece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolved not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on, and encouraged by the Lacedaemonians: and for refusal were exposted as Sacrilegiers, and accused to all their neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawful to invade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captain of their own, cast the same dice of hazard that Cæsar after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their own Nation. And the better to bear out an ungracious quarrel, of which there was left no hope of composition, they resolved to sack the Temple it self. For seeing that for the ploughing of a piece of Apollo's ground, they had so much offended their Neighbour-god, and their Neighbour-Nations, as war could not befall them than already was intended; they resolved to take the gold with the ground, and either to perish for all, or to prevail against all that had commission to call them to account. The treasure which they took out of the Temple in the beginning of the War, was ten thousand talents, which in those days served them to wage a great many men; and such was their success in the beginning of the War, as they won three great battels against the Thebans, Thessalians and Locrians; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus cast himself headlong over the Rocks.

In the mean while the Cities of Cheroneus, both to defend themselves against their bad neighbour Philip, who encroached upon them, and to draw others into their quarrel, rendered themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the siege of Adethone lost one of his eyes. It is said, said, That he that shot him, did purposely direct his arrow toward him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof: After Philippo; After to Philip: for so he was called that gave him the wound. This City he evened with the soil.

Plut. in Phil. lib. 18.

The Tyrant Lycophon before mentioned, while Philip was busied on the border of Thrace, and the Thessalians engaged in the holy War, entred Thessaly with new Forces, being assisted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Army, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped for to entertain the Thessalians at home, as they should not find leisure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time called into Thessaly; but both the Thessalians and Macedonians (Philip being present) were utterly overthrown by Onomarchus, and great numbers of both Nations lost. From Thessaly, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Beotia, and with the same Victorious Army brake the forces of the Beotians, and took from them their City of Coronea. But Philip, impatient of his late misadventure, after he had re-enforced his Army, returned with all speed into Thessaly, there to find again the honour which he lately lost: and was the second time encountered by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twenty thousand foot, and five hundred horse. All this great preparation sufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Army overturned, six thousand slain, and three thousand taken: of which number himself being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Those that fled, were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which sailed along the coast, commanded by Cares; but the greatest number of those that took the Sea, were therein devoured ere they recovered them. Lycophon was now again driven out of Thessaly, and Pheres made free as before.

§. V.

Of the Olynthian War. The ambitious practices of Philip.

From hence Philip resolved to invade Phocia it self, but the Athenians did not favour his entrance into those parts; and therefore with the help of the Lacedaemonians, they retrench'd his passage at the Straits of Thermopylae. Whereupon he returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Actyberne, Torone, and other Towns, he quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had evermore both braved and beaten the Macedonians. It is said, that Philip having put to death Archelaus his half brother (for Amintas had three sons by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other sons by Cygea: but Philip elder Brother by the same Mother being dead, he determined to rid himself also of the rest) the two younger held themselves within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the War, Justin affirmeth. Just quarrels are ballanced by just Princes, but to this King all things were lawful that might serve his turns; all his affections, and passions, how divers soever in other men, were in his ambition swallowed up, and thereto converted. For he neither forbore the murder of his own brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelity: he esteemed no place strong where his Ais loaden with gold might enter; nor any City or State unconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could lose the sense of other mens sorrow and subjection. And because he thought it vain to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had inclosed all the power they had within their own walls; he entred their Territory, and by the advantage of a well-compounded and trained Army, he gave them two overthrowes ere he fate down before the City it self: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Lajthene from their people, and from the service of their Country and Common-weale, by whose treason he entred the Town, slew his brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the Inhabitants for slaves by the drum. By the spoil of this place he greatly enriched himself, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withal, which he daily did. For so was he advised by the Oracle in the beginning of his undertaking, That he should make his assaults with silver spears: Whereupon Horace well and truly said,

— Diffidit Urbinum
Portas vir Macedo, & subruit annulos
Reges muneribus.

Hor. Carm.
Od. 16.

By gifts the Macedon clave Gates asunder, And Kings envying his estate brought under.

And it is true, that he won more by corruption and fraud, than he did by force. For as he had in all the principal Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spain:) So when in the contention between the Competitors for the Kingdom of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator; he came not to the Council accompanied with Piety and Justice, but with a powerful Army, and having beaten and slain both Kings, gave sentence for himself, and made the Kingdom his own.

§. VI.

How Philip ended the Phocian War.

The War still continued between the Phocians and the Associates of the holy War: the Boeotians, finding themselves unable to subsist without some present aid, sent unto Philip for succour, who willingly yielded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to assure themselves; but yet to enable them to continue the War, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirty talents, which makes a hundred and four score thousand Crowns; but when with these supplies they had till the worst against the Phocians, who held from them three of the strongest Cities within Boeotia it self, they then besought Philip of Macedon that he would assist them in person, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territory, and in all things obey his Commandments in War.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himself in state to give the law to both, and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedy pace towards Boeotia, where being arrived, Phallicus who commanded the Phocian Army, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his own peace, and withdrew himself with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leaving the Phocians to the mercy of the Conqueror; and for conclusion he had the glory of that War called Sacred, which the Grecians with so many mutual slaughters had continued for ten years; and besides the glory, he possessed himself of Orchomene, Coronea, and Corfsa, in the Country of the Boeotians, who invited him to be victorious over themselves. He brought the Phocians into servitude, and wasted their Cities, and gave them but their Villages to inhabit, reserving unto himself the yearly tribute of three score talents, which make six and thirty thousand French Crowns. He also hereby (besides the fame of piety for service of the gods) obtained the same double voice in the Council of the Amphyctones which the Phocians had, with the superintendency of the Pytian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian sacrilege.

How Philip with ill success attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

Philip, after his triumphant return into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Army Parmenio, slaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians and Dardanians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their Revenues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians stayed his fury. Perinthus was a City of Thrace, seated upon Propontis, in the mid-way between Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resolved to defend their liberty against Philip, where the Athenians encouraged and assisted them. Philip late down before it with a puissant Army, made many fair breaches, gave many furious assaults, built many over-topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repelled with equal violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continual assaults to weary them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persians with men and money, and succoured from Byzantium, which stood upon the same Sea-coast, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoever was wanting to their necessity. But because those of Byzantium by reason of their neighbourhood, and easie passage by water, gave them often and ready help, Philip removed the one half of his Army, and besieged it, leaving fifteen thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could: But, to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly do that undertake divers enterprises at one time) and returned into Macedon with no less dishonor than loss: whereupon he made an overture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired it: to which though Phocion perswaded them all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly advantage their conditions; yet Demosthenes with his eloquence prevailed in the refusal. In the mean while, Philip having digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred three score and ten Merchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his son Alexander, led them into Scythia: but he was also unprosperous in that enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Mesia, set on him in his return, wounded him, and took from him the greatest part of the spoils which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How Philip overthrowing the Greeks in the battel of Cheronæa, was chosen Captain-General of Greece. The death of Philip.

Among these Northern Nations (part of which he suppressed, and part quieted) he spent some eight years; and in the ninth year, after the end of the Holy War, he was, by his great advantage, invited again by the Gracians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissa having disobeyed the decree of Amphyctones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Locrians gave countenance and aid to the Amphissians, the rest were not of themselves able to constrain them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must think that Philip was not long in resolving upon this enterprise; he needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keep back; nor other dissuasion than a mastering power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Army forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entered Phocia, won Platea, and brought into subjection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to fear that a great part of this force would fall on themselves, yet were they dissuaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice (having drawn the Thebans to joyn with them) to leave the enjoying of their estates and their freedom to the chance of one battel, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Orators eloquence cost them dear. It is true, that he could far more easily mind them of the virtue of their Ancestors, than make them such as they were. He might repeat unto them (with words moving passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transform the Macedonians into Persians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Aristides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great virtues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that ever Nation did. A Phocion they had; but by the strength of a contrary faction he was at this time in disgrace, and not employed; in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incourted, although some thousands of the Athenians did abide the killing, and the like number well-near of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of the worthy men on that side to hold up the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choice Captains of the Macedonians, encouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gave to Philip to finish a victory, that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despite of all the Nations interjacent) in Persia, India, and Egypt; so it cut to the ground, and gave end and date to all the Gracian glory; Yea their liberty (saith Curtius) with their large Dominion won with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and forever lost.

Now this advised King (never passionate to his disadvantage) to the end he might obtain the Sovereignty over all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captain-General against the Persians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let go those Athenians that were taken at this battel of Cheronæa, as he also forbore to attempt any thing against their City: but in Thebes (which lately by the virtue of Epaminondas triumphed over the rest) he lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soon after (according unto the long desire which he had nourished of this Sovereignty) by the general States at Corinth, styled the first Commander of all the Gracians, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Army of great strength, and under the Commandment of Alcidas and Parmenio, transported the same over the Hellepont into Asia, to begin the War. Of his enterprise against Persia, he fought success from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he received such another convertible riddle, as Cresus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like sort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discern and withstand the Batteries of our own appetites, so did Philip ambitious desire to invade Persia, abate his Judgement, so far, that the death, wherewith himself was threatened, he understood to be delivered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to invade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, he prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus; to which feast and pastimes thereof appointed, he invited all his Friends and Allies, with the principal persons of the Grecian Cities, from whom he received much honour and many rich Presents: but this was indeed the Feast of his Funeral. For, having refused to do justice to one Pausanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly favoured by Philip) had first made drunk, and then left to be carnally abused by divers base persons; this Pausanias grew into so great a detestation of the Kings partiality in so foul a fact, as, when Philip was passing towards the Theatre, he drew a sword from under his long garment and wounded him to death, when he had lived six and forty years, and reigned five and twenty. Justine reports it, that Olympias encouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband; which after his death she boldly avowed, by the honour she did unto Pausanias, in crowning his dead body, in consecrating his Sword unto Apollo, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces.

§. XI.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatness were laid by Philip. Of his laudable qualities and issue.

NOW although he were then taken from the World, when he had mastered all opposition on that side of the Sea, and had seen the fruits of his hopes, and labours, changing colour towards ripeness and perfection; yet he was here-in happy, that he lived to see his Son Alexander at mans estate, and had himself been an eye-witness of his resolution and singular valour in this last battel.

The foundation of whose future greatness he had laid so soundly for him, with so plain a pattern of the Buildings which himself meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was far more easie to Alexander, though more glorious, than the beginnings unto Philip, though less famous. For, besides the recovery of Macedon it self in competition between him and the Sons of Eropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Albanians; and besides the regaining of many places possessed by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the overthrow of Olynthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritime Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedom; and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it self against the greatest Kings of the World, and won upon them; He left unto his Son, and had bred up for him, so many choice Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and judgement in the War, were no less worthy of Crowns, than himself was that wore a Crown: For it was said of Parmentio (whom Alexander, ungratefull to so great virtue, impiously murdered) That Parmentio had performed many things challenging eternal fame, without the King; but the King without Parmentio never did any thing worthy of renown: as for the rest of his Captains, though content to obey the Son of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more Vices, than Nature and his excellent education had enriched him with virtues. For, besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this favour of Piety, that he rather laboured to satisfy those that were grieved, than to suppress them. Whereof (among many other) we find a good example in his dealing with Arcadion and Nicanor. Whom when for their evil speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death, he answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gave him ill language, or in himself; Secondly, that it was in every mans own power to be well spoken of; and this was shortly proved; for after Philip relieved their necessities, there were none within his Kingdom that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon he told those that had perswaded him to use violence, that he was a better Physician for evil speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his Son are remembered by Cicero and Gellius; and by Dion and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyanus and Eronimus; his wife sayings, by Plutarch. And albeit he held Macedon as in his own right, all the time of his reign, yet was he not the true and next Heir thereof; for Antyntas the Son of his Brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the Protection during his infancy) had the the right. This Antyntas he married to his daughter Cyna, who had by him a daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philip's base Son Aridaeus, her Uncle by the Mothers side: both which Olympias, Philip's first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridaeus by extreme torments, Eurydice the strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Uncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her Brother Alexanders death slain at Sardis, by the commandment of Antigonos.

By Aidata an Illyrian, his second Wife, he had Cyna, married as is shewed before.

By Niceipolis, the Sister of Jafon, Tyrant of Ephesus, he had Thesalonica, whom Cassan- der, after he had taken Pidna, married; but she was afterward by her Father-in-law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra the Niece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be roasted to death in a Copper Pan. Others lay his murder to Alexander himself. By the same Cleopatra he had likewise a daughter called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers brest.

By Phila and Meda he had no issue.

He had also two Concubines, Arfinae, whom after he had gotten with child, he married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomy King of Egypt, called the Son of Lagus, but esteemed the Son of Philip: by Philinna, his second Concubine, a publick Dancer, he had Aridaeus, of whom we shall have much occasion to speak hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of ALEXANDER the Great.

§. I.

A brief rehearsal of Alexanders doings, before he invaded Asia.

ALexander, afterwards called the Great, succeeded unto Philip his Father; being a Prince no less valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and enriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his reign upon the Macedonians four hundred and seventeen years, after Rome was built, and after his own birth twenty years. The strange dreams of Philip his Father, and that one of the gods in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as foolish Tales; but, that the Temple of Diana (a work the most magnificent of the World) was burnt upon the day of his birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the news of three several Victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and fore-shewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Upon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had oppressed, began to consult about the recovery of their former liberty, and to adventure it by force of arms. Alexanders young years gave them hope of prevailing; and his suspected severity increased courage in those, who could better resolve to die, than to live slavishly. But Alexander gave no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily have endangered the health of his Estate. For after revenge taken upon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew upon his Tomb, and the celebration of his Funerals, he first fastened unto him his own Nation, by freeing them from all exactions and bodily slavery, other than their service in his Wars; and used such Kingly austerity towards those that continued his young years, and such clemency to the rest that perswaded themselves of the cruelty of his disposition, as all affections being pacified at home, he made a present journey into Peloponnesus, and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Council of the States of Greece, he was, according to the great desire of his heart, elected Captain-General against the Persians, upon which war Philip had not only relieved, (who had obtained the same title of General Commander) but had transported under the leading of Parmentio.

This enterprise against the Perſian occupied all Alexander's affections; thoſe fair marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now ſhot at both ſleeping and waking; all other thoughts and imaginations were either grievous or hatefull. But a contrary wind ariſeth: for he receiveth advertiſement, that the Athenians, Thebans and Lacedæmonians, had united themſelves againſt him, and, by aſſiſtance from the Perſian, hoped for the recovery of their former freedom. Hereunto they were perſwaded by Demosthenes, himſelf being thereto perſwaded by the gold of Perſia: the device he uſed was more ſubtile than profitable; for he cauſed it to be bruited, that Alexander was ſlain in a battail againſt the Triballes, and brought into the aſſembly a companion whom he had corrupted, to affirm that himſelf was preſent, and wounded in the battail. There is indeed a certain Doctrine of Policy (as Policy is now a-days deſined by falſehood and knavery) that defined rumours and lies, if they ſerve the turn but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true, Common people are ſometimes mockt by them as Souldiers are by falſe alarms in the wars; but in all that I have obſerved, I have found the ſucceſs as ridiculous as the invention. For as thoſe that find themſelves at one time abuſed by ſuch like bruits, do at other times neglect their duties, when they are upon true reports, and in occaſions perilous, ſummoned to aſſemble; ſo do all men in general condemn the Vendors of ſuch trumpery, and for them, fear upon neceſſary occaſion to entertain the truth it ſelf. This labour unlooked for, and loſs of time, was not only very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his ſword from the ignoble and effeminate Perſians, againſt which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Græcians, of whoſe aſſiſtance he thought himſelf aſſured, his preſent undertaking was greatly diſordered. But he that cannot endure to ſtrive againſt the wind, ſhall hardly attain the Port which he purpoſeth to recover: and it no leſs becometh the worſthieft men to oppoſe miſfortunes, than it doth the weakeſt children to bewail them.

He therefore made ſuch expedition towards theſe Revolters, as that himſelf, with the Army that followed him, brought them the firſt news of his preparation. Hereupon all ſtagger, and the Athenians, as they were the firſt that moved, ſo were they the firſt that fainted, ſecking by their Embaſſa-dours to pacifie the King, and to be received again into his grace. Alexander was not long in reſolving; for the Perſians perſwaded him to pardon the Græcians. Wiſe men are not eaſily drawn from great purpoſes by ſuch occaſions as may eaſily be taken off, neither hath any King ever brought to effect any great affair, who hath intangled himſelf in many enterpriſes at once, not tending to one and the ſame certain end.

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he reſolved to aſſure thoſe Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Triballes, Peones, Gætes, Agreans, and other ſavage People, which had greatly vexed with inſcurſions, not only other of his Predeceſſors, but even Philip his Father: with all which, after divers Overthrows given them, he made peace, or elſe brought them into ſubjection. Notwithſtanding this good ſucceſs, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more natural to man than liberty: the Greeks had enjoyed it over-long, and loſt it too late to forget it; they therefore ſhake off the yoke once again. The Thebans, who had in their Cittadell a Garriſon of 3000 Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander haſtneſs to their ſuccour, and preſents himſelf with 30000 foot, all old Souldiers, and 3000 Horſe, before the City, and gave the Inhabitants ſome days to reſolve, being even heart-ſick with the deſire of paſſing into Asia. So unwilling, indeed, he was to draw blood of the Græcians, by whom he hoped to ſerve himſelf elſewhere, that he offered the Thebans remiſſion, if they would only deliver into his hands Phœnix and Proſtyles, the ſtirrers up of the Rebellion. But they, oppoſing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all reſiſtance before it, like the breaking in of the Ocean Sea) inſtead of ſuch an answer, as men beſieged and abandoned ſhould have made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be delivered unto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the balance of Fortune with the Kingdom of Macedon, and many other Provinces, could either have evened the ſcale or ſwayed it. Therefore in the end they periſhed in their obſtinacy. For while the Thebans oppoſe the Army aſſailant, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garriſon, their City taken and razed to the ground, fix thouſand ſlain, and thirty thouſand ſold for ſlaves, at the price of four hundred and forty Talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Græcian Cities.

to forbear the deſtruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to believe that they were rather miſ-led, by giving haſty credit to falſe reports, than any way malicious; for being perſwaded of Alexander's death, they rebelled but againſt his ſucceſſour. He alſo beſought the King to remember, that his Father Philip had his education in that City, yea, that his Anceſtour Hercules was born therein: but all perſwaſions were fruitleſs; the times wherein offences are committed do greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all the race of Pindarus the Poet, and ſpared, and ſet at liberty Timoclea, the Siſter of Theages, who dyed in defence of the liberty of Greece againſt his Father Philip. This noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him raviſhed, he threatened to take her life unleſs ſhe would confeſs her treaſure: ſhe led that Thracian to a Well, and told him, that he had therein caſt it: and when the Thracian stooped to look into the Well, he ſuddenly thruſt him into the mouth thereof and ſtoned him to death.

Now becauſe the Athenians had received into their City ſo many of the Thebans, as had eſcaped and fled unto them for ſuccour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but upon condition to deliver into his hands both their Orators which perſwaded this ſecond revolt, and their Captains; yet in the end, it being a torment unto him to retard the enterpriſe of Perſia, he was content that the Orators ſhould remain, and accepted of the baniſhment of the Captains; wherein he was exceeding ill-adviſed, had not his fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the reſiſtance againſt him unprofitable: for theſe good Leaders of the Græcians betook themſelves to the ſervice of the Perſian, whom after a few dayes he invaded.

§. II.

How Alexander paſſed into Asia, fought with the Perſians upon the River of Granicus.

When all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the truſt of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the firſt of the Spring did paſs the Helleſpont, and being ready to diſ-embark, he threw a Dart towards the Aſian ſhore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waſte in their own Territory, or to burn, or deſace thoſe buildings which themſelves were preſently, and in the future to poſſeſs. He landed his Army, conſiſting of two and thirty thouſand foot, and five thouſand horſe, all old Souldiers, near unto Troy, where he offered a ſolemn Sacrifice upon Achilles Tomb, his maternal Anceſtor.

But before he left his own coaſt, he put to death, without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-laws Kinſmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not ſparing ſuch of his own as he ſuſpected. He alſo took with him many of his tributary Princes, of whoſe fidelity he doubted; thinking by unjuſt cruelty to aſſure all things, both in the preſent and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended unto him, though agreeing very well with the Juſtice of God; for all that he had planted, was ſoon after withered, and rooted up; thoſe, whom he moſt truſted, were the moſt traiterous; his mother, friends, and children, ſell by ſuch another mercileſs ſword as his own, and all manner of conſuſion followed his dead body to the grave, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexander's landing on Asia ſide was brought to Darius, he ſo much ſcorned the Army of Macedon, and had ſo contemptible an opinion of Alexander himſelf, as having ſtilled him his ſervant on a letter which he wrote unto him, reprehending his diſloyalty and audacity (for Darius intitled himſelf King of Kings, and the Kinſman of the gods) he gave order withall to his Lieutenants of the leſſer Asia, that they ſhould take Alexander alive, whip him with rods, and then convey him to his preſence: that they ſhould ſink his ſhips, and ſend the Macedons taken priſoners beyond the Red-Sea; belike into Ethiopia, or ſome other unhealthfull part of Africa.

In this ſort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartleſs multitude which he commanded, diſpoſe of the already-vanquiſhed Macedonians: But the ill deſtines of men bearing them to the ground, by what ſtrong confidence ſoever armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heap into the field, gave rather an exceeding advantage to his enemies, than any diſcouragement at all. For, beſides that they were men utterly unacquainted with dangers; men, who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to prevail againſt thoſe of leſs courage than themſelves; men that took more care how to embroider with gold and ſilver their upper garments, as if they attended the invaſion but of the Sun-beams, than they did to arm themſelves with Iron and Steel againſt against the sharp pikes, swords, and darts of the hardy Macedonians; I say, besides all these, even the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which every one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turn to fight, filled every one of them with the care of their own safety, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their own breath, and that of their Horses, in running away. The Macedonians, as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselves with the Gold and Jewels of Perſia, both which they needed; so the Perſians, who expected nothing in that War but blows and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to constrain them in assembling themselves for his service; but their own fears and cowardice, which in time of danger had most power over them, they only then obeyed, when their rebellion against to serve a passion did justly and violently require it. For, saith Vegetius, Quem admodum bene exercitatus miles prelium cupit, ita formidat indoluit; nam sciuntum est in pugna nihil amplius prodesse quam vires. As the well-practised Soldier desires to come to battle, so the raw one fears it: for we must understand, that in fight it more avails to have been accustomed unto the like, than only to have rude strength. What manner of men the Perſians were; Alexander discovered in the first encounter; before which time it is said, by those that wrote his story, that it was hard to judge, whether his daring to undertake the Conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with an handful of men, or the success he had, were more to be wondered at. For at the River of Granick, which severeth the Territory of Troy from Propontis, the Perſians fought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and bank of the River to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to climb up unto, and scale from the Level of the water. Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Perſians, yet in the end Alexander prevailed. But it seems to me, that the Victory then gotten was exceeding easie, and that the twenty thousand Perſian footmen, said to be slain, were rather killed in the back, in running away, than hurt in the bosoms by resisting. For had those twenty thousand foot, and two hundred and fifty horse-men, or, after Plutarch, two thousand and five hundred horse-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not have bought their lives at so small a rate, as with the loss of four and thirty of all sorts of his own. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountered two of the Perſian

Commanders, Spithridates and Rafaches; and that the Perſian horse-men fought with great fury, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Gracians in Darius his pay, holding themselves in one body upon a piece of ground of advantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how then doth it resemble truth, that such resistance having been made, yet of Alexander's Army there fell but twelve footmen, and two and twenty horse-men?

THE winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terror upon all those of the lesser Asia, as he obtained all the Kingdoms thereof without a blow, some one or two Towns excepted. For in all invasions, where the Nations invaded have once been beaten upon a great advantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Straights, and Mountains, they will soon have persuaded themselves, that such an enemy upon equal terms and even ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therefore Machiavels counsel, That he which resolveth to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the natural difficulty of the ways. One passage or other is commonly left unguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Country be distracted; and yet lightly some one place will be found that is defended very weakly. How often have the Alpes given way to Armies, breaking into Italy? Yea, Where shall we finde that ever they kept out an Invader? Yet are they such as (to speak briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that travel over them; but they give no security to those that lye behind them: for they are of too large extent. The Towns of Lombardy persuaded themselves that they might enjoy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Dutchy of Milan: but whilst these Patrons of Milan, whom their own dwelling in those Mountains had made fittest of all other for such a service, were busied in custody of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lombardy, so much the

the greater terror of the Inhabitants, by how much the less they had expected his arrival. What shall we say of those Mountains, which lock up whole Regions in such sort, as they leave but one Gate open; The Straights, or (as they were called) the Gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopylae, have seldom been attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how seldom (if ever) have they been attempted in vain? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopylae; Cyrus the younger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how strongly soever they had been locked and barred, yet were those Countries open enough to a Fleet that should enter on the back-side. The defence of Rivers, how hard a thing it is, we find examples in all histories that bear good witness. The deepest have many Floods; the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boats, in case it be found a matter of difficulty to make a bridge. He that hath men enow to defend all the length of his own bank, hath also enow to beat his enemy; and may therefore do better to let him come over, to his loss, than by striving in vain to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his own disadvantage, fill the heads of his Soldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, having their means of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly, if a River were sufficient defence against an Army, the Isle of Atona, now called Anglesey, which is divided from North-Wales by an Arm of the Sea, had been safe enough against the Romans, invading it under the conduct of Julius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to spend the time in making Vessels to transport his forces, did assay the floods. Whereby he amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like provision by Sea, that surely believing nothing could be hard or invincible to men, which came so minded to War, they humbly intreated for peace, and yielded the Island. Yet the Britains were men stout enough, the Perſians were very daftards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to pass the River of Granick in face of the enemy; not marching higher to seek an easier way, nor labouring to convey his men over it by some safer means. For, having beaten them upon their own ground, he did thereby cut off no less of their reputation, than of their strength, leaving no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such unable Protectors.

Soon after this Victory he recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians, and Magnesia, which were rendered unto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Country, he received with great grace, suffering them to be governed by their own Laws. For he observed it well; Novum Imperium inchoantibus, utilis clementie fama; It is commodious unto such as lay the foundations of a new Sovereignty, to have the fame of being mercifull. He then by Parmenio wan Miletus, and by force mastered Halicarnassus, which because it resisted obstinately, he razed to the ground. From whence he entered into Caria, where Ada the Queen, who had been cast out of all that he held (except the City of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her self unto him, and adopted him her Son and Successor; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdom to her disposing. He then entered into Lycia, and Pamphylia, and obtained all the Sea-coasts, and, subjeeting unto him Pisidia, he directed himself towards Darius (who was said to be advanced towards him with a marvellous Army) by the way of Phrygia. For, all the Province of Asia the less bordering upon the Sea, his first Victory laid under his feet.

While he gave order for the government and settling of Lycia, and Pamphylia, they sent Cleander to raise some new Captains in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entered Celenus, seated on the River Meander, which was abandoned unto him; the Castle only holding out, which also after forty dayes was given up: for so long time he gave them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenus he pass'd on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a City called Gordium, the Regal Seat, in former times, of King Midus. In this City it was, that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to undo, he cut it asunder with his Sword. For there was an ancient Prophecy did promise to him that could untie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, (so it were done, affirmed to himself the fulfilling of the Prophecy, by heaving it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the less towards the east, he took care to clear the Sea-coast on his back, and to thrust the Perſians out of the Islands of Lesbos, Chio, and Cos: the charge whereof he committed unto two of his Captains, giving them such order as he thought to be most convenient for that service; and delivering unto unto them fifty Talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first spoyle gotten, he sent threecore Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Celenus he removed to Ancira, now called Anguri, standing on the same River of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there he mustered his Army, and then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselves unto him, and obtained freedom of tribute: where he left Catus Governour with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Here he understood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which heartned him greatly to pass on towards him; for of this only Captain he had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath undertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-wealths, the erection of Monarchies, the Conquest of Kingdoms and Empires, guided handfulls of men against multitudes of equal bodily strength, contrived victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, converted the fearfull passions of his own followers into magnanimity, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits have been stirred up in sundry Ages of the world, and in divers parts thereof, to erect and cast down again, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certain ends, which the infinite Spirit of the Univerſal, piercing, moving, and governing all things, hath ordained. Certainly, the things that this King did, were marvellous, and would hardly have been undertaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to have invaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would have contented himself with some part thereof, and not have discovered the River of Indus, as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ran over so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may justly be imputed unto this, that he was never encountered by an equal spirit, concurring with equal power against him. Hereby it came to pass that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, than desert places, and the meer length of tedious journeys could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praiseworthy, as for the huge bulk. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discover as brave a spirit as Alexanders, and working no less exquisitely, though the effects were less material, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would find the exact pattern of a noble Commander, must look upon such as Epaminondas, that encountering worthy Captains, and those better followed than themselves, have by their singular virtue over-topped their valiant enemies, and still prevailed over those, that would not have yielded one foot to any other. Such as these are, do seldom live to obtain great Empires. For it is a work of more labour and longer time, to alter the equal forces of one hardy and well-ordered State, than to tread down and utterly subdue a multitude of servile Nations, compounding the body of a gross unwieldy Empire. Wherefore these Paro-Potentes, men that with little have done much upon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choice examples of worth; but great Conquerours, to be rather admired for the substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing: exactness and greatness concurring so seldom, that I can find no instance of both in one, save only that brave Roman, Cæsar.

Having thus far digressed, it is now time that we return unto our Eastern Conquerour: who is travelling hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recover the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch unto Greece, he sent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Persian Targets which he had recovered in this first battle; upon which, by certain inscriptions, he made them partakers of his Victory. Herein he well advised himself; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gains in the Wars, as he doth of the spoils, shall never be long followed of those of the better sort. For men which are either well-born, or well-bred, and have more of wealth than of reputation, do as often satisfy themselves with the purchase of glory, as the weak in fortune, and strong in courage, do with the gain of gold and silver.

The Governour of Cilicia hearing of Alexanders coming on, left some Companies to keep the Streights, which were indeed very defensible; and withall, as Curtius noteth, he began over-late to prize and put in execution the Counsel of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Wars advised him to waste all the provisions for Men and Horse, that could not be lodged in strong places, and always to give ground to the Invader, till he found some such notable advantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of Victory. For the fury of an invading Army

Army is best broken, by delays, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes reposing themselves in beds, and more often on the cold ground. These and the like sudden alterations bring many diseases upon all Nations out of their own Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleep, and refusing to give or take battle, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, he might perchance have saved his own life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest encouragements given by Alexander, to the Macedonians, in the third and last fatal battle, That they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes when he invaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost only his men; but Darius being invaded by the Greeks, and fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his Kingdom. Pericles though the Lacedæmonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athen, yet could not be drawn to hazard a battle: for the invaded ought evermore to fight upon the advantage of time and place. Because we read Histories to inform our understanding by the examples therein found, we will give some instances of those that have perished by adventuring in their own Countries, to charge an invading Army. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brink of their destruction.

Pompey was well advised for a while, when he gave Cæsar ground; but when by the importunity of his Captains he adventured to fight at Pharsalia, he lost the battle, lost the freedom of Rome, and his own life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battle with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound judgement, that those Counsels which promise surety in all things, are honorable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fifth, when he invaded Provence, by waisting the Country, and forbearing to fight: so did the Duke of Alva weary the French in Naples, and dissolve the boisterous Army of the Prince of Orange in the Low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrary to the advice of their General, would needs fight a battle with the Bourgonians, invading their Country, and could not be persuaded to linger the time, and stay their advantage; but they lost eight and twenty thousand upon the place. Philip of Valois set upon King Edward at Cressy; and King John (when the English were well-near tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit have been walled to nothing) constrained the black Prince with great fury, near Poitiers, to joynt battle with him: But all men know what lamentable success these two French Kings found. Charles the fifth of France made another kind of Fabian-Warfare; and though the English burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbear blows, and followed his advice, which told him, That the English could never get his inheritance by smother. And it is reported by Bellay and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that he won from him the Dutchy of Guyen without ever putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wife men grow short-lived, and the charge of things is committed unto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any found advice. The course which Memnon had pronounced, must in all appearance of reason have brought the Macedonians to a great perplexity, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shameful to return, or dangerous to proceed. For, had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia been wasted whilst Alexander was far off; and the Streights of Cilicia been defended by Arſenes, Governor of that Province, with the best of his forces; hunger would not have suffered the enemy, to stay the trial of all means that might be thought upon, of forcing that passage: or if the place could not have been maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leisure have been so thoroughly spoiled, that the heart of his Army should have been broken, by seeking out miseries by painful travel.

But Arſenes leaving a small number to defend the Streights, took the best of his Army with him, to waste and spoil the Country; or rather, as may seem, to find himself some work, by pretence of which he might honestly run further away from Alexander. He should rather have adventured his person in custody of the Streights, whereby he might perhaps have saved the Province; and in the meantime, all that was in the fields, would have been conveyed into strong Towns. So should his Army, if it were driven from the place of advantage, have found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himself with his horsemen have had the less work in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gave the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders coming; and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all forms of danger. These Guardians of the Straights, hearing that Arseus made all haste to join himself with Darius, burning down all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, began to grow circumspect, and to think that surely their General, who gave as lost the Country behind their backs, had exposed themselves unto certain death, as men that were good for nothing else but to dull the Macedonian swords. Wherefore not affecting to dye for their Prince and Country (which honour they saw that Arseus himself could well forbear) they speedily followed the foot-steps of their General, gleaming after his Harvest. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardize of his Enemies, and the whole Province that had been alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

§. IV.

Of the unwelcome Army levied by Darius against Alexander. The unadvised courses which Darius took in this expedition. He is vanquished at Ilius; where his Mother, Wife and Children are made prisoners: of some things following the battle of Ilius.

IN the mean season Darius approached, who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Army of more than two hundred and ninety thousand Souldiers, out of divers Nations; Justine musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horles; Plutarch, at six hundred thousand.

The manner of his coming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a Masker than a man of War, and like one that took more care to set out his glory and riches, than to provide for his own safety, persuading himself, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pomp and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Army there was carried the holy Fire, which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests; and after them three hundred and threecore and five young men, answering the number of the days of the year, covered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Jupiter drawn with white Horles, with their Riders clothed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; and after it, the Horle of the sun: Next after these follow ten sumptuous Chariots, in-layed and garnisht with silver and gold; and then the Vantguard of their horle, compounded of twelve several Nations, which the better to avoid confusion, did hardly understand each others language; and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serve very fitly to disorder all that followed them: in the tail of these Horles the Regiment of foot marched, with the Persians called Immortals, because if any died, the number was presently supplied: and these were armed with chains of gold, and their coats with the same metal imbroidered, whereof the sleeves were garnished with pearl: baits, either to catch the hungry Macedonians withal, or to persuade them that it were great incivility to cut, and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said, Sumptuosus indutus miles, se virtute superiorem aliis non existimat, cum in preliis oporteat fortitudine animi, & non vestimenti muniri, quoniam hostes vestibus non debellantur; Let no man think, that he exceedeth those in valour, whom he exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of mind, and not by the apparel they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Trojans that this advice was borrowed, who, when he fought against the Samites in that fatal battel, wherein they all swore either to prevail or dye, thirty thousand of them having apparelled themselves in white garments, with high crests, and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aside all fear: Non enim cristas vulnera facere, & per pila atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no body, and the Roman pike would bore holes in painted and gilded shields.

To second this Court-like company, fifteen thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breed the more terror) and these were honored with the Title of the Kings Kinmen. Then came Darius himself, the Gentlemen of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serve, but they served their turns of these, by changing their massive-bodies into thin, portable and current coynt. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, covered with an open-winged Eagle of the same metal: The hinder part being raised high whereon Darius sat, had a covering of ineffimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horsemens, their Lances plated with silver, and their heads gilt; which they meant not to imbrue in the Macedonian blood, for fear of marring their beauty.

beauty. He had for the proper Guard of his own person, two hundred of the blood Royal; blood, too Royal and precious to be spilt by any valorous adventure (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdy fellows, like the Switzers, would have done him more service) and these were backt with thirty thousand foot-men, after whom again were led four hundred spare horles for the King, which if he had meant to have used, he would have marshalled somewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Reer-ward, the same being led by Sisgambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great train of Ladies their attendants on horle-back, with fifteen Wagons of the Kings children, and the wives of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fifty Concubines, and a world of Nurses and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apparalled. By which it should seem that Darius thought that the Macedonians had been Comedians or Tragicians; for this troop was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at battels. Between these and a company of light-armed slaves, with a world of Varlets, was the Kings treasure, charged on six hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proved, to pay the Macedonians. In this sort came the Play-game King into the field, incumbered with a most unnecessary train of Strumpets, attended with troops of divers Nations, speaking divers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled; and for the most part for effeminate, and so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could not but have encouraged the naked Nation of the world against them. We find it in daily experience, that all discourse of Magnanimity, of National Virtue, of Religion, of Liberty, and whatsoever else hath been wont to move and encourage Virtuous men, hath no force at all with the common Souldier, in comparison of spoil and riches. The rich ships are boarded upon all disadvantage; the rich Towns are furiously assaulted, and the plentiful Countries willingly invaded. Our English Nation have attempted many places in the Indies, and run upon the Spaniards headlong, in hope of their Royals of plate, and Pistols; which had they been put to it upon the like disadvantages in Ireland, or in any poor Country, they would have turned their Pieces and Pikes against their Commanders, contending that they had been brought without reason to the butchery and slaughter. It is true that the War is made willingly, and for the most part with good success, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needy are always adventurous, so plenty is wont to run peril, and men that have well to live, do rather study how to live well, I mean wealthily, than care to dye (as they call it) honourable. Car où il n'y a rien à gagner que des coups, volontiers il n'y va pas. No man makes haste to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blows.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his Southayers, he would have satiated himself by the outsidings of the Persians, and never have looked into the intrails of Beasts for success. For leaving the description of this second battel (which is indeed no where well described; neither, for the confusion and hasty running away of the Asians, could it be) we have enough by the slaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to inform us what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that threecore thousand Persian footmen were slain in this battel, with ten thousand of their horlemen; or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horsemens, and besides this slaughter, 40000 taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Army there miscarried but two hundred and fourscore of all sorts, of which numbers Arrianus and other Historians cut off almost the one half; I do verily believe, that this small number rather died with the over-travel and pains-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes received from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate and the backbit of the World) had had any favour remaining of the ancient valour of their fore-fathers, they would never have sold to good cheap, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings children; had their own honour been valued by them at nothing, and the Kings safety and his estate at less. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a banished Græcian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which he had assembled of divers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in passing by they would devour, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to assail; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbatelled in gross squadrons, which they call their Phalanx, well covered with Armour for defence, and furnished with weapons for offence of great advantage, would make no little account of his delicate Persians, loving their ease and their palate, being withall ill armed, and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertain (having so great abundance of treasure to do it withal) a sufficient number of the same Grecians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equal courage, he would repent him overlate, as taught by the miserable success like to follow.

But this discourse was so unpleasing to Darius (who had been accustomed to nothing so much as to his own praises, and to nothing so little as to hear truth) as he commanded that this poor Grecian should be presently slain: who while he was a sundering in the Tormentors hand, used this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom he had given this good counsel, should assuredly revenge his death, and lay deserved punishment upon Darius for despising his advice.

It was the saying of a Wife man: Desperate ejus, Principis saluti est, cujus aures ita formata sunt, ut aspera que utilis, nec quicquam nisi juvenum accipiat; That Princes safety is in a desperate case, whose ears judge all that is profitable to be too sharp, and will entertain nothing that is unpleasant.

For, liberty in Council is the life and essence of Council; Libertas consilii est ejus, vita, & essentia, qua crepta consilium evanescent.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the advice given him by the Grecian Souldiers that served him, who intreated him not to fight in the Straights: But had they been Counsellors and Directors in that War, as they were underlings and commanded by others, they had with the help of a good troop of horsemen been able to have opposed the fury of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot men. For when Darius was overthrown with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Grecians, under their Captain Amynias, held firm, and marched away in order, in despite of the Vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: we read in Histories ancient and modern, what brave retraits have been made by them, though the rest of the Army in which they have served, hath been broken.

At the battel of Ravenna, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a Squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off unbroken and undismayed; whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Neumours, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the Victory not entire by their escape, he was overthrown and slain in the place. For it is truly said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers, fear them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminente mali, opus ipsum, quantumvis difficile, aggrediuntur; They go about the business of it self, how hard soever it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which the mischief hanging over their heads may bring: and astutely of those that know the Wars but by hear-say; Quod valentes sunt & praevalentes ante pericula, in ipsi tamen periculis descendunt; They have ability enough, and to spare, till dangers appear; but when peril indeed comes, they get them gone.

These Grecians also that made the retreat, advised Darius to retire his Army into the plain of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champions, he might have invironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withal they counselled him to divide that his huge Army into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might have fought many battels, and have brought no greater number at once than might have been well marshalled and conducted. But this Counsel was so contrary to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inviron the Grecians which gave the advice, and to cut them in pieces as Traytors. The infinite wisdom of God doth not work always by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdoms and Estates, by taking understanding from the Governours, so as they can neither give nor discern of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander upon a straightened piece of ground, neer unto the City of Issus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could (who by the advice of Parmenio stayed there, as in a place of best advantage) was utterly overthrown, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Grecian his followers had perswaded him to leave in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their train of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queen, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due unto their birth, their Honours preserved, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored unto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautiful Lady, and his Daughters of excellent form, yet Alexander mastered his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Aristobolus the Historian, that he embraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, non, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobility of Persia in effect, fell into captivity; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to fix thousand and two hundred talents of coyn, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himself leaving his brother dead, with divers other of his chief Captains, (casting the Crown from his head) hardly escaped.

After this overthrow given unto Darius, all Phenicia (the City of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Governor.

Aradus, Zidon and Biblos, Maritime Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast, that it trod on his heels; for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the less, overthrew the Cappadocians, Cappha-gonians, and others lately revolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admiral, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians: newly levied; the Lacedemonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; four thousand of those Greeks which made the retreat at the last battel, forsaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amynias into Egypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to divide Kingdoms.

Alexander to honor Ephesion, whom he loved most, gave him power to dispose of the Kingdom of Zidon. A man of a most poor estate, that laboured to sustain his life being of the Royal blood, was commended by the people unto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the same hour.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wished that he could bear his prosperity with the same moderation, and quietness of heart, that he had done his adversity; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not perform in himself that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a sign that he did but accompany, and could not Govern his felicity.

While he made some stay in those parts; he received a letter from Darius, importing the ranfome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an overthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornful answer upon the offer of peace, than they did before the tryal of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast leafe; the one a resolved, well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdaind the offers of Darius, and sent him word, that he not only directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himself.

§. V.

How Alexander besieged and won the City of Tyre.

Alexander coming near the City of Tyre, received from them the present of a golden Crown, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he took very thankfully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a Sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their City, from whom he was defended. But the Tyrians like not his company within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old City adjoining, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolved to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Island whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Main, yet with the labour of many hands, having great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, he filled the passage of the Sea between the Island and the Main, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea upon a storm of wind, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torn asunder; yet with the help of his Navy which arrived (during the siege) from Cyprus, he overcame all difficulties and prevailed, after he had spent seven months in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the City, in respect whereof, and of the great loss of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those that escaped the fury, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserved for slaves (saith Diodore) thirteen thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Many more more had died, had not the Zidonians, that served Alexander, conveyed great numbers away by shipping unto their own City.

Happy it was for Apollō that the Town was taken: for one of the Tyrians having dreamt, that this god meant to forsake the City, they bound him fast with a golden chain to the Idol of Urcules; but Alexander, like a gracious Prince, loosed him again.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprize, and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nebuchodennasor had taken it before, and filled up the channel that lay between the Island and the Main.

The Government of this Territory he gave to Philotas the Son of Parmenio; Cecilius, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant under Parmenio; Ephesion had charge of the Fleet, and was directed to find Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

§. VI.

How Darius offered Conditions of Peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza, and deals graciously with the Jews.

IN the mean while Darius sends again to Alexander, lets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and lays the loss of the last Battel to the streightness of the place: he hoped to terrifie him by threatening to encompass him in the plain Countries, he bids him to consider, how impossible it was to pass the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearful things: for he that was now filled with nothing but fear, had arguments enow of that nature to prevent unto another. All the Kingdoms between the River of Alps, and the Hellepont, he offered him in Dower with his beloved Daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his own, and that which victory and his own virtue had possit him of; That he was to give conditions, and not to receive any, and that he having passed the Sea it self, did disdain to think of reluctance in transporting himself over Rivers. It is said, That Parmenio, who was now old, and full of honour and riches, told the King, That were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and coming before Gaza, Geth, a faithful servant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Town with an obdurate resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander received a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his leg with a stone. He found better men in this place than he did at the former Battels; for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the Sands of Gaza, that he was forced to fend for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entered Gaza by assault, and taken Betis (whom Josephus calleth Babensis) that was weakened with many wounds, and who never gave ground to the Assailants; he bored holes thorow his feet, and caused him to be drawn about the street, whilst he was as yet alive; who being as valiant a man as him self, disdained to ask him either life or remission of his torments. And what had he to countenance this his tyranny, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Heitor? It is true; that cruelty hath always somewhat to cover her deformity.

From Gaza (saith Josephus) he led his Army towards Jerusalem, a City, for the antiquity and great fame thereof, well known unto him while he lay before Tyre; He had sent for some supply thither, which Jaddus the High-Priest, being subject and sworn to Darius, had refused him. The Jews therefore fearing his revenge, and unable to resist, committed the care of their estates and safety to Jaddus, who, being taught by God, shined out of the City covered with his Pontifical Robes, to wit, an upper garment of Purple, embroidered with gold; with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the Name of God was written, the Priests and Levites in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a manner so unusual, stately, and grave, as Alexander greatly admired it. Josephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the High-Priest, as reverencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it. Howsoever it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprize, and so assured of the success after the Prophecy of Daniel had been read unto him, wherein he saw himself, and the Conquest of Perſia so directly pointed at, as nothing thenceforth could discourage him, or fear him. He conspired to Parmenio (saith Josephus) that in Dio a City of Macedon, when his mind laboured the Conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleep such a person as Jaddus, and so apparelled, professing one and the same God; by whom he was encouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand, with assurance of victory. This apparition, formerly apprehended only by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eyes, wherewith he was so exceedingly ingly pleased and emboldened, as contrary to the practice of the Phœnicians (who hoped to have sacked and destroyed Jerusalem) he gave the Jews all, and more than they desired, both of liberty and immunity, with permission to live under their own Laws, and to exercise and enjoy their own Religion.

Alexander wins Egypt: and makes a journey to the Temple of Hammon.

FROM Jerusalem, Alexander turned again towards Egypt, and entered it; where Darius his Lieutenant, Astaces, received him, and delivered into his hand the City of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this we see, that the King of Perſia, who had more of affection than of judgement, gave to the valiantest man he had, but the command of one City, and to the veryest coward the government of all Egypt. When he had set things in order in Egypt, he began to travel after God-head, towards Jupiter Hammon; so foolishly had prosperity made him. He was to pass over the dangerous and dry Sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels back was spent, he could not but have perished, had not a marvellous shower of rain fallen upon him, when his Army was in extreme despair. All men that know Egypt, and have written thereof, affirm, That it never rains there: but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to pass what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those vast deserts, that a flight of Crows flew before the Army; who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Army was cast back, guided them over those pathless Sands to Jupiter's Temple.

Arriano, from the report of Ptolomy, the Son of Lagus, says, That he was led by two Dragons; both which reports may be alike true. But many of those wonderful prodigious things, are fained by those that have written the Story of Alexander; as, That an Eagle lay hovering directly over his head at the battel of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnassus, fore-shewing the treason of Xerxes, practised by Darius to have slain him; That from the Iron bars of which the Tyrians made their defensive Engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of blood; and that the like drops were found in a loaf of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turf of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the Air. The Spaniards in the Conquest of the West Indies have many such pretty tales; telling how they have been assisted in battel by the presence of our Lady, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I think themselves do hardly believe. The strangest thing that I have read of in this kind, being certainly true, was, That the night before the battel at Novara, all the Dogs which followed the French Army, ran from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning upon them, as if they had been bred and fed by them all their lives, and in the morning following, Trivulzi and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by their imperial Switzers utterly broken and put to rout.

The place of this Idol of Jupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius: for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, between whom and the Territory of Hammon, the Region Thebais, or the superior Egypt, with the Mountains of Lybia, and the River of Nilus, are interjacent; and on the North he joins it to a Nation called Nassamones, who bordering the Sea-shore, live (saith he) upon the spoils of ship-wrack: whereas the Temple or Grove of this Idol hath no Sea near it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Nassamones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica.

When Alexander came near the place, he sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be given in all things, agreeable to his mad ambition; who affected the title of Jupiter's Son. And so he was saluted, Son of Jupiter, by the Devils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some think) defective in the Greek Tongue; For whereas he meant to say, O padion, he said, O paidios; that is, O Son of Jupiter, instead of O dear son: for which Grammatical error he was richly rewarded, and a rumour presently spread, that the Great Jupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his own.

He had heard that Perſeus and Hercules had formerly consulted with this Oracle. The one when he was employed against Gorgons; The other against Anteus and Buffris; and seeing these men had derived themselves from the gods, Why might not he?

By

By this it seems, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fools, though indeed he made himself one, by thinking to cover from the worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirm his followers in the belief of his Deity, he had practis'd the Priests to give answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleasing to Jupiter to honor Alexander as his Son.

Curt. I. 4.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a Bos carried in a Boat, or by a Ram, or a Rams head, I see that many wise men have troubled themselves to find out; but, as Arrianus speaks of Doingsius or Liber Pater (who lived, saith S. Augusline, in Atosís time) Ea qua de diis veteres fabulis suis conscripserunt, non sunt nimium curiosè perveſtiganda; We must not over-curiously search into the fables which the Ancients have written of their gods.

But this is certain and notable, that after the Gospel began to be preached in the World, the Devil, in this, and all other Idols, became speechless. For, that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cæsar, and in the time of Trajan altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witness.

There is found near his Temple a Fountain called Fons Jolis (though Protony in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at Mid-night is as hot as boiling water, and at Noon as cold as any Ice: to which I cannot but give credit, because I have heard of some other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by S. Augusline, by Diodore, Herodotus, Pliny, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others; and indeed our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night than in the day.

§. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

From the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis, where, among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher PAmmones, who, belike understanding that he affected the title of Jupiter Son, told him that God was the Father King of all men in general; and refining the pride of this haughty King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortal men, but that he acknowledged none for his children, save good men.

He gave the charge of the several Provinces of Egypt to several Governors, following the rule of his Master Aristotle. That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperors also followed, not daring to commit the Government of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank and degree. He then gave order for the founding of Alexandria upon the Westernmost branch of Nilus. And having now settled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the Kingdoms of the lesser Asia, Phoenicia, and Syria (which being but the pawns of Darius his ill fortune, one happy victory would readily have redeemed) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage, though the same was committed to Mazæus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance past it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a River for the swiftness thereof called by the Persians, The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it self tells us, might Darius easily have repelled the invading Macedonian: for the violent course of the stream was such, as it drave before it many weighty stones, and those that moved not, but lay in the bottom, were so round and well polished by a continual rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing; nor the Macedonian footmen to wade the River, otherwise than by joining their hands, and enterlacing arms together, making one weighty and entire body to resist the swift passage, and furious race of the stream. Besides this notable help, the Channel was so deep towards the Eastern shore, where Darius should have made head, as the footmen were enforced to lift their Bows, and Arrows, and Darts, over their heads to keep them from being moistened, and made unserviceable by the Waters. But it was truly and understandingly said of Homer,

*Talis est hominum terrestrium mens,
Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumq; (Deorumq;*

The minds of men are ever so affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the world, by the surfeit of misgovernment have been subject to many grievous, and sometimes mortal diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it self into a burning and consuming Fever, and thereby become frantick, and without understanding, fore-shewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Eastern shores of Tygris, without any other difficulty, than that of the nature of the place;

place; where Mazæus (who had charge to defend the Passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himself to the Macedonians; followed with certain companies of Horsemen, as if with uneven forces he durst have charged them on even ground, when as with a multitude far exceeding them, he forsook the advantage which no valour of his enemies could easily have overcome. But it is commonly seen, that fearful and cowardly men do ever follow those wayes and counsels, whereof the opportunity is already lost.

It is true, that he set all provisions asire, wherewith the Macedonians might serve themselves over Tygris, thinking thereby greatly to have distressed them; but the execution of good counsel is fruitless, when unseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competency of the Army which he conducted. Those things also which he fought to waste, Alexander being now in fight, were by his Horse-men saved and recovered. This Mazæus might have done some days before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a strength of horsemen, as the Macedonians durst not have pursued them, leaving the strength of their foot out of fight, and far behind.

The new Provisions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the Battel of Arbela.

Darius, upon Alexanders first return out of Egypt, had assembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (saith Curtius) that rather served to make up the names of men, than to make resistance. Arrianus hath numbred them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all sorts ten hundred thousand, and of horse four hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Curtius, who musters the Army of Darius at two hundred thousand foot, and near fifty thousand Horse, comes (I think) nearer to the true number; and yet seeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassals, it is like enough that he had gathered together of all sorts some three or four hundred thousand, with which he hoped in those fair plains of Assyria, to have overborn the few numbers of the invading Army. But it is a Rule in the Philosophy of the War;

In omni prælio non tam multitudo, & virtus indecisa, quam ars & exercituum solent præstare victoriam; In every Battel skill and practice do more towards the Victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gave rest to his Army after the passage over Tygris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moon, of which the Macedonians not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude always are) took it for a certain presage of their overthrow and destruction, inasmuch as they began not only to murmur, but to speak it boldly; That for the ambition of one man, a man that disdained Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Son of Jupiter, they should all perish; for he not only enforced them to make War against worlds of enemies, but against Rivers, Mountains, and the Heavens themselves.

Hereupon, Alexander being ready to march forward, made a halt, and to quiet the minds of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Soldiers might be assured that this defection of the Moon was a certain presage of good success; for, that it was natural, they never imparted to the common people, but reserved the knowledge to themselves, so as a sorry Almanack-maker had been no small fool in those days.

Of this kind of superstitious observation Cæsar made good use, when he fought against Arivistus and the Germans: for they being persuaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moon, they should certainly lose the Battel, Cæsar forced them to abide it, though they durst not give it; wherein, having their minds already beaten by their own superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Army in effect perished.

These Egyptians gave no other reason than this, That the Grecians were under the aspect of the Sun, the Persians of the Moon; and therefore the Moon failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of failing, and their glory of being obscured. This judgement of the Egyptian Priests being noised through all the Army, all were satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the War, which, though devised since, was well observed then: Exercituum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captain lead his Army to the fight when it is possessed with matter of terror.

It is truly observed by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, we find it in all stories, and often in our own, that by such inventions, devised tales, dreams, and Prophecies, the people of this Land have been carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their own loss and ruine.
O o o o people

As Alexander drew near the Persian Army, certain Letters were surprized, written by Darius to the Gracians, perswading them for great summs of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these, by the advice of Parmentio, he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his fair Wife, oppressed with sorrow, and wearied with travel, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no less to bewail than Darius, who upon the first bruit, suspected that some dishonourable violence had been offered her; but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his own that attended her, of Alexander's kindly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortal gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to confer it on so just and continent an enemy as Alexander; to whom he once again, before the last trial by Battel, offered these conditions of Peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliver up, and resign all Asia the less; and, with Egypt, all those Kingdoms between the Phenician Sea, and the River of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the Ranfome of his Mother, and his other Daughters, thirty thousand Talents, and that for the performance thereof, he would leave his Son Oebus in hostage: To this they sought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had. Alexander causing the Embassadors to be removed, advised with his Council, but heard no man speak but Parmentio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perswaded him to accept of these fair conditions. He told him, That the Empire between Euphrates and Hellefont, was a fair addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian Prisoners was a great cumber, and the treasure offered for them of far better use than their persons, with divers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable, that if he had followed his advice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might have lived as famous for virtue, as for Fortune, and left himself a Successour of able age to have enjoyed his estate, which afterward indeed he much enlarged, rather to the greating of others than himself: who, to assure themselves of what they had usurped upon his Issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few years after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so far into the East, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a just and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, advised, and grateful: and being taught new Lessons of wine, of his own flattery, and of extreme cruelty. Yea, as Seneca hath observed, the taint of one unjust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beauty of all his great acts, and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors stay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoever he had bestowed on the wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his own natural clemency and magnanimity, without any respect to their Master; but thanks to an enemy was improper: that he made no Wars against adversity, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summs of money to perswade his friends to attempt upon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant; yet he could not (were it otherwise and faithful) resolve in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made War against him, not as a King with Royal and overt-force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practice; That for the Territory offered him, it was already his own, and if Darius could beat him back again over Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then believe that he offered him somewhat in his own power: Otherwise he propounded to himself for the reward of the War which he had made, all those Kingdoms as yet in Darius possession; wherein, whether he were abused by his own hopes or no, the Battel which he meant to fight in the day following should determine. For in conclusion he told them, that he came into Asia to give, and not to receive; That the Heavens could not hold two Suns: and therefore if Darius would be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance be perswaded to give him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

The Battel of Arbela: and that it could not be so strongly fought as report hath made it.

With this Answer the Embassadors return; Darius prepares to fight, and sends Mazeus to defend a passage, which he never dared yet so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captains. Parmentio perswades him to force Darius his Camp by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not move terror in the Macedonians being but few. Alexander disdaines to steal the Victory, and resolves to bring with him the day-light, to witness his valour. But it was the success that made good Alexander's resolution, though the counsel given by Parmentio was more sound: For it is a ground in War, Si pauci necessarij cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est noctis tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwithstanding upon the view of the multitude at hand, he staggers and trenches himself upon a ground of advantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for fear of surprize had stood with his Army in Armour all the day, and forborn sleep all the night, Alexander gave his men rest and store of food; for reason had taught him this Rule in the War, In pugna Milites validius resistent, si cibo potuque refecti fuerint; nam famem intrinsecus magis pugnat, quam ferrum externum: Souldiers do the better stand to it in fight, if they have their bellies full of meat and drink; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than steel without.

The numbers which Alexander had, faith Arrianus, were forty thousand foot, and seven thousand horse; these belike were of the European Army: for he had besides, both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He used but a short speech to his Souldiers to encourage them. And I think that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former Battels upon the River of Granick, and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria victoriam parat, animusque victoriosus augeat, & adversariis auriat; One victory begets another, and puts courage into those that have already had the better, taking spirit away from those that have been beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this Battel, fought at Gangamela; They tell us of many charges and re-charges; That the Victory inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmentio was in danger of being overthrown, who led the left wing; That Alexander's Rere-guard was broken, and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both sides, Fortune her self was long unresolved on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, that Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retreat. But in conclusion, Curtius delivers us in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible dayes work, saying, That Ephestion, Perdiccas, and others of name were wounded. Arrianus finds not a third part of this number slain; of the Persians there fell forty thousand (saith Curtius) thirty thousand, according to Arrianus; ninety thousand, if we believe Diodore. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former Battels, the Persians upon the first charge ran away, and that the Macedonians pursued; For if of those four or five hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, every man had cast but a dart or a stone, the Macedonians could not have bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as six or seven hundred men in three notorious Battels. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander upon the banks of Euphrates, and had armed but fifty or three-score thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had been impossible for Alexander to have past that River so easily, much less the River of Tigris. But as a man whose Empire God in his Providence had determined, he abandoned all places of advantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so far into the bowels of his Kingdom, as all hope and possibility of escape by retreat being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented unto them the choice, either of death or victory; to which election Darius could no way constrain his own, seeing they had many large Regions to run into from those that invaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following the Battel of Arbela. The yielding of Babylon and Susa.

Darius, after the rout of his Army, recovered Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight: He propounded unto them that ran after him, his purpose of making a retreat into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedy of spoil and riches, would rather O o o o 2 attempt attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobility rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soon after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great mass of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendered to him: for the fear which conducted Darius, took nothing with it but shame and dishonour. He that had been twice beaten, should rather have sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so near the place where he abid the coming of his enemies; if he had been victorious, he might have brought it after him at leisure; but being overcome, he knew it impossible to drive Mules and Camels laden with gold from the pursuing enemy, seeing himself, at the overthrow he had in Cilicia, cast the Crown from his head, to run away with the more speed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable; Es præterita magis reprehendi possunt quam corrigi: It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander took his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus, in whom Darius had most confidence, rendered himself, his Children, and the City. Also the Captain of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, strewed the Streets with flowers, burnt Frankincense upon Altars of silver, as Alexander passed by, and delivered unto him whatsoever was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captain in great solemnity to entertain their new King: after these came the Babylonian horse-men, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poor in warlike furniture. Between these (though not greatly to be feared) and himself, Alexander caused his Macedonian foot-men to march. When he entered the Castle, he admired the glory thereof, and the abundance of treasure therein found, amounting to fifty thousand Talents of silver uncoined. The City itself I have elsewhere described, with the Walls, the Towers, the Gates and Circuit, with the wonderful place of pleasure about two miles in Circuit, surrounded with a wall of fourscore foot high, and on the top thereof (being under-born with Pillars) a Grove of beautiful and fruitful Trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queen and other Princesses might walk privately there in. In this City, rich in all things, but most of all in voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himself and the whole Army four and thirty dayes, consuming that time in banqueting, and in all sorts of effeminate exercise; which so much softened the minds of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the severe discipline of War, which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painful travel, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Here it was that those bands of a thousand Souldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed over them, who thereupon were siled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honour those Captains which were found by certain selected Judges to have deserved best in the late War. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing down of the foot-bands in this latter age hath been the cause (saith the Marshall Monluc) that the title and charge of a Captain hath been bestowed on every Picque-Ban, or Spurr-Cow; for when the Captains of foot had a thousand Souldiers under one Ensign, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honourable, and the Kings were less charged, and far better served. King Henry the eighth of England never gave the Command of any of his good Ships, but to men of known valour, and of great estate; nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of quality Commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe; for Antipater sent him six thousand foot, and five hundred horse out of Macedon; of Thracians three thousand foot, and the like number of horse; and out of Greece four thousand and four hundred horse, by which his Army was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly be brought again, De quitter la plume pour dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boards.

He left the Castle and City of Babylon, with the Territories about it, in charge with three of his own Captains, to wit, Agathus, Mimetus, and Appollodorus; to supply all wants, a thousand Talents: but to grace Mazeus, who rendered the City unto him, he gave him the title of his Lieutenant over all, and took with him Bagistines that gave up the Castle; and having distributed to every Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon, and entered into the Province Satrapene: from thence he went on toward Susa in Persia, the same which Ptolemy, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, situate on the River Euleus, a City sometime governed by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites also, Governour of this famous City, gave it up to the Conquerour, with fifty thousand talents of silver in bullion, and twelve Elephants for the War, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this sort, did those Vassals of fortune, lovers of the Kings prosperity, not of his person, (for to all ambitious men are) purchase their own peace and safety with the Kings treasures. And herein was Alexander well advised, that whatsoever titles he gave to the Persians, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his own Captains, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battle, all the Nobility of Persia would have returned unto their natural Lord. Those that are Traitors to their own Kings, are never to be used alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertain them, nor ever to be trusted with the defences of any frontier Town, or Fortres of weight, by the rendering whereof they may redeem their liberty and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Navarra, being banished out of Spain, was trusted, with Fonterabe, in the year 1523.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazeus might have furnish'd the King from Babylon; and while he stayed four and thirty dayes at Babylon, Abulites might have holpen him from Susa; and while he feasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might have relieved him; for the great mass of Treasure was laid up in that City. But who hath sought out and friended fearful adversity? It is certain, that benefits bind not the ambitious, but the honest; for those that are but greedy of themselves, do in all changes of fortune only consult the conservation of their own greatness.

The Government of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, he committed to his own Macedonians, making Abulites, who rendered it unto him, his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in giving them titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius mother and her children to repose themselves.

It is said that Charles the fifth, having promised Charles of Bourbon the Government of Marcellers, if he could have forc'd it, and whereby he made sure account, told some of his nearest Counsellors, that he meant nothing less than the performance of that promise, because he should thereby have left the Duke (revolted from his Master) very well wherewithall to have recovered his favour.

§. XII.

How Alexander came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

From Susa Alexander leadeth his Army toward Persepolis, and when he sought to pass those Mountains which under Susiana and Persia, he was foundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended against him those Streights, called Pyle Perside, or Suicide, and after the loss of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forc'd to save himself by retreat, causing his Foot to march close together, and to cover themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain-top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, living in that Country discovered unto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforc'd to fight upon even ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis; but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receive him) he returned and gave a second charge upon the Macedonians, wherein he was slain. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the year 1515, find a way over the Alpes, the Switzers undertaking to defend all the passages, who if their footman-ship had not saved them upon the Kings descent on the other side, they had been ill paid for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Four thousand Greeks, saith Curtius (Justine numbers them but at eight hundred) having been taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their hands, noses, ears; add other members, as they could no way have been known to their Country-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gave three hundred Crowns, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to live upon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grandees, hearing of Alexander's approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receive him, and prayed him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoyl the Kings treasure. This City was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants upon Alexander's arrival, and they that stayed followed the worst Council; for all was left to the liberty of the Souldiers, to spoyl and kill at their pleasure. There was

Paris, speaks of more than forty thousand talents in bullion, and of nine million of gold, but does not say for what use.

no place in the world at that time, which, if it had been laid in the balance with Persepolis, would have weighed it down. Babylon indeed, and Susa, were very rich; but in Persepolis lay the bulk and main store of the Persians. For after the spoil that had been made of money, curious Plate, Bullion, Images of Gold and Silver, and other Jewels, there remained to Alexander himself one hundred and twenty thousand talents. He left the same number of three thousand Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, and gave the same formal honour to the Traitor Tristates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his own. The body of his Army he left here for thirty dayes, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand Horse, and certain troops of chosen foot, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had covered; a fruitless and foolish enterprise, but, as Seneca sayes; Non ille ire vult, sed non potest stare: He hath not a will to go, but he is unable to stand still. It is laid and spoken in his praise, That when his Souldiers cryed out against him, because they could not endure the extreme frost, and make way, but with extreme difficulty, through the snow, that Alexander forsook his Horse, and led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremity, thereby to shew how well himself can endure it? His walking on foot did no otherwise take off their weariness that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drink, did quench their thirst, that could less endure it. For mine own little judgement, I shall rather commend that Captain that makes careful provision for those that follow him, and that seeks wisely to prevent extreme necessity, than those witless arrogant fools, that make the vaunt of having endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We find in all the Wars that Cæsar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the provision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Coligni, Admiral of France; That who so will shape that Beast (meaning War) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians that were most amorous of his virtues, complain, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemency towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drink; That he smothered in carousing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by defending, as it were, from the reverend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be defiled both of his own and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle and City of Persepolis to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper virtue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to think hardly of him, and thereby alien their hearts; for they might well believe that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing less than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Post violentiam crudelitiam sequitur: Cruelty doth commonly follow armenness: For it so fell out soon after, and often, in Alexander.

§. XIII.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

About this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to find Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Army, which he meant to have increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexanders coming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as he had, which was numbered at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once again to try his fortune. He therefore calls together his Captains and Commanders, and propounds unto them his resolution, who being deperate of good success, used silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of War, who had sometime lived with Philip of Macedon, brake the ice, and protesting that he could never be beaten by any adversity of the Kings, from the faith which he had ever ought him, with firm confidence, that all the rest were of the same condition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Nabarzanes and Bessus, whereof the later was Governour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master; and therefore advised the King to lay a new foundation for the War, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: this preambled Naburzanes used, and in conclusion advised the election of his fellow Traytor Bessus, with promise that, the Wars ended, the Empire should again be restored to Darius. The King (swollen with disdain, prest towards Naburzanes to have slain him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, withheld him. In the mean while Naburzanes with-drew himself, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Army. Artabazus, the Kings faithful servant, perswaded him to be advised and serve the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made; which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yielded unto. Bessus makes his submission, and attends the King, who removes his Army. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of four thousand Greeks, which had in all the former battels served Darius with great fidelity, and always made the retreat in sight of the Macedonians, offered himself to guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus; but it was not his destiny to follow their advice who from the beginning of the War gave him faithful counsel, but he inclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greeks, with Patron their Captain, were corrupted by Alexander, and practised the division of his faithful servants. Bessus had drawn unto him thirty thousand of the Army, promising them all those things, by which the lovers of the World and themselves are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, safety, and honour.

Now the day following, Darius plainly discovered the purposes of Bessus, and being overcome with passion, as thinking himself unable to make head against these ungrateful and unnatural Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithful servant to depart from him, and to provide for himself. In like sort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all save a few of his Eunuchs; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Persians being most base cowards, durst not undertake his defence against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had four thousand Greeks to joyn with him, who had been able to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himself, no man follows. It had been far more Man-like, and King-like, to have dyed in the head of those four thousand Greeks, which offered him the disposition of their lives, (to which Artabazus perswaded him) than to have lyen bewailing himself on the ground, and suffering himself to be bound like a slave by those ambitious Monsters that laid hand on him, whom neither the consideration of his former great estate, nor the honour he had given them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could move to pity: no, nor his present adversity, which above all things should have moved them, could pierce their viperous and ungrateful hearts. Vain it was indeed to hope it; for, Infidelity hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound and laid in a Cart, covered with hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be discovered; and, to add despatch and derision to his adversity, they fastened him with Chains of Gold, and drew him on among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Naburzanes perswaded themselves to redeem their lives and the Provinces they held, either by delivering him a prisoner to Alexander, or, if that hope failed, to make themselves Kings by his slaughter; and then to defend themselves by force of Arms. But they failed in both. For it is against the nature of God, who is most just, to pardon so strange villany, yea, though against a Prince purely Heathenish and an Idolater.

Alexander having knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durst not abide his coming, hastened after him with a violent speed, and because he would not force his footmen beyond their powers, he mounted on horse-back certain selected companies of them, and best armed, and with six thousand other Horse, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus, and secretly forsook him, gave knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus took, and how near he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander again doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being discovered by Bessus his Rear, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount thereon, and to save himself. But the unfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, and slew two poor Servants that attended his person. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the rest to the mercy of the Macedonian swords.

Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursuit of the vanquished prest with thirst, as he was was refreshing himself with some water that he had discovered, espying a Cart with a Team of wounded beasts breathing for life, and not able to move, searched the fame, and therein found Darius bathing in his own blood: And by a Persian Captive which followed this Polystratus, he understood that it was Darius, and was informed of his barbarous Tragedy. Darius also seemed greatly comforted, (if dying men ignorant of the living God can be comforted) that he cast not out his last sorrows unheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traytors, which had dealt no less unworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their revenge to Alexander by this messenger, which he besought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his own honour, and for the safety of all that did, or should after wear Crowns. He also having nothing else to present, rendered thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace used towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, desiring the immortal Gods to submit unto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking, impatient Death pressing out his few remaining Spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he lived but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, wherewith to desire the gods to reward his compassion.

How Alexander pursued Bessus, and took into his grace Darius his Captains.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their travels were near an end, every man preparing for his return. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieved, for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundless Ambition. Many arguments he therefore used to draw on his Army farther into the East, but that which had most strength, was, that Bessus, a most cruel Traytor to his Master Darius, having at his devotion the Hircanians and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should return) make himself Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the fruits of all their former travels. In conclusion he wan their consents to go on: which done, leaving Craterus with certain Regiments of foot, and Amynas with six thousand horse in Parthenia, he enters not without some opposition into Hircania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, desired certain passages for a while. He passeth the River of Zioberta, which taking beginning in Parthia, dissolves it self in the Caspian Sea: it runneth under the ledge of Mountains, which bound Parthia and Hircania, where hiding it self under ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth again, and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta, or Zendracarta, the same City which Ptolomy writes Hircania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fifteen days, banqueting and feasting therein.

Phatarnes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with others of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and Governments. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approved and constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and five hundred Greeks, the remainder of all those that had served Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end, they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedemonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader having slain himself. He was also wrought (though to his great dishonour) to receive Nabarzanes that had joyned with Bessus to murder Darius.

§. XV.

Of Thalestris Queen of the Amazons; where, by way of digression, it is shewed, that such Amazons have been and are.

HERE it is said, that Thalestris or Minothea, a Queen of the Amazons, came to visit him, and her sute was, (which she easily obtained) that the might accompany him till she were made with child by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) she returned into her own Country.

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But indeed, the letters of Alexander himself to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian business, may justly breed suspicion of the whole matter as forged. Much more justly may we suspect it as a vain tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his books to Lysimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage, was laugh at by the King for inserting such news of the Amazons; and Lysimachus himself had never heard heard of. One that accompanied Alexander, took upon him to write his acts; which to amplify, He told how the King had fought single with an Elephant, and slain it. The King hearing such stuff, caught the book, and threw it into the river of Indus; saying, That it were well done to throw the Writer after it, who by inserting such fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we believe and know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we give credit unto Writers making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaves the matter undetermined. Therefore I will here take leave to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some modern discoverers touching these warlike Women, because not only Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether or no there were any such kind of people.

Julius Solinus seats them in the North parts of Asiatic the less. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one on the River Thermodoon, the other near the Caspian Sea; Quas (saith he) Sauromatidas appellant; which the people call Sauromatides. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum est (saith Vadianus, who hath commented upon Mela) illos proximos Amazonibus fuisse; It is certain that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. Ptolomy set them farther into the Land North-wards, near the Mountains Hippaci, not far from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it self toward India, Solinus and Pliny tell us. Where they governed a people called the Pandean or Padeans, so called after Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest derive themselves. Claudian affirms, That they commanded many Nations: For he speaks (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

— Medis levibusque Sabæis
Imperat hic Sextus: Reginarumque sub armis, Barbarie pars magna jacet.

Over the Medes, and light Sabeans reigns
This female sex: and under arms of Queen, Great part of the Barbarian Land remains.

Diodorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith he) than those which kept the banks of Thermodoon, a River falling into the Euxine Sea, near Heraclium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom he tells us that the Syrians call Eorpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the less, sacked Ephesus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Manellon and Aventinus report; which they performed forty years after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy it self we read of Penthesilea, that she came to the succour of Priamus.

Am. Marcellinus gives the cause of their inhabiting upon the River of Thermodoon, speaking confidently of the wars they made with divers Nations, and of their overthrow.

Plutarch in the life of Thesius; out of Philostratus, Hellenicus and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiope Queen of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him given to Thesius; though some affirm, That Thesius himself got her by stealth, when she came to visit him aboard his ship. But in substance there is little difference; all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speaks of certain companies of the Amazons, that came to aid the Albanians against the Romans, by whom after the battle, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken up; and he saith farther, That these women entertain the Gele and Legales once a year, Nations inhabiting between them and the Albanians.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez, who hath written the navigation of Orellana, which he made down the river of Amazon from Peru in the year, 1542. (upon which river, for the divers turnings, he is said to have sailed six thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Council of the Indies, That he both saw those women, and fought with them, where they fought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

It is also reported by Vlrichus Schmidel, that in the year, 1542. when he sailed up the Rivers of Paragua and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Country, called Schorver, inhabiting under the Tropick of Capricorn, who gave his Captain Ernando Riffese, a Crown of silver, which he had gotten in fight from a Queen of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopez, in his description of the Kingdom of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling us, That (agreeably to the reports of elder times) they burn off their right breasts, and live apart from men, save at one time of the year, when they feast and accompany company them for one month. These (saith he) possess a part of the Kingdom of Monomotapa in Africa, nineteen degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest Guards of this Emperor, all the East-Indian Portugals know.

I have produced these authorities in part, to justify mine own relation of these Amazons, because that which was delivered me for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how upon the River of Papamena (since the Spanish discoveries called Amazons) that these women still live and govern, was held for a vain and unprobable report.

§. XVI.

How Alexander fell into the Persian Luxury: and how he further pursued Bessus.

NOW as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Persepolis: so at this time his prosperity had so much over-wrought his virtue, as he accounted clemency to be but baseness, and the temperance which he had used all his life-time, but a poor and dejected humour, rather becoming the instructors of his youth, than the condition and state of so mighty a King as the World could not equal. For he periwaded himself, that he now represented the greatness of the gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground and adore him; he wore the robes and garments of the Persians, and commanded that his Nobility should do the like: he entertained in his Court and Camp, the same shameless rabble of Curtisians, and Sodomitical Eunuchs, that Darius had done; and imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, and detested manners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So licentious is felicity, as notwithstanding that he was fully periwaded, that the gods whom he served (detesting the vices of the invaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, he himself, contrary to the Religion he professed (which how Idolatrous soever it were, could not be but fearful unto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, and not by ignorance or education, a more foul and fearful Monster than Darius, from whose tyranny he vaunted to have delivered to many Nations. Yea, those that were dearest and nearest unto him, began to be abashed of him, entreating each other with this, and the like scornful discourse; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of so many travels, more impoverished in their virtues, than enriched by their victories; and that it was hard to judge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered, were the baser slaves. Neither were these opinions so reserved, but that the noise of them came to his ears. He therefore with great gifts sought to pacify the better sort, and those of whose judgments he was most jealous; and making it known to the Army, that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called himself Artaxerxes; and that he had compounded a great Army of the Bactrians, and other Nations, he had arguments enough to persuade them to go on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themselves (so far engaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoils of so many Cities, as the whole Army seemed but the guard of their carriages (not much unlike the warfare of the French) having commanded every mans tards to be brought into the Market-place, he together with his own, caused all to be consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but have proved most dangerous unto him, seeing the common Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painful travels, and with their blood, than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often observed) his happy temerity overcome all things. As he was in his way, news came to him, that Satibarzanes, whom he had established in his former Government over the Arians, was revolted; whereupon leaving the way of Bactria, he sought him out; but the Rebel, hearing of his coming, fled to Bessus, with two thousand Horse. He then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire, with the advantage of a strong wind, won the passage over an high and unaccessable Rock, which was defended against him with thirteen thousand foot. For the extremity of the flame and smoke forced them from the place, otherwise invincible. I saw in the third civil War of France, certain Caves in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high-Rocks, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certain bundles of straw, let down by an Iron chain, and a weighty stone in the midst, those that defended it, were so smothered, as they rendered themselves, with their plate, money, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three years before my arrival in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Country-people, who did set the long dry grass on fire to the Eastward of them (the wind in those parts being alwaies East) so as, notwithstanding their flying from the smoke, there was not any one that escaped. Sir John Burrows also, with a hundred English was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the West-Indies, by having the grass fired behind him; but the smoke being timely discovered, he recovered the Sea-shore with the loss of sixteen of his men. I remember these things; but to give caution to those that shall in times to come invade any part of those Countries, that they alwaies, before they pass into the Land, burn down the grass, and sedge, to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemy than a handful of straw set on fire, dye the death of Hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hive.

A Conspiracy against Alexander; The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

Alexander was, after he parted hence, no where resisted, till he came into Aria, to the East of Bactria, where the chief City of that Province, called Artacana, was a while defended against him, by the revolt of Satibarzanes; but in the end he received the Inhabitants to mercy. At this place his Army was re-enforced with a new supply of five thousand and five hundred foot, and near five hundred horse, out of Greece, Thessaly, and other places. His journey out of Persia into these parts, is very confusedly described. For, having (as all his Historians tell us) a determination to find Bessus in Bactria, he leaves it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyrcania; from thence he wanders Northwards towards the obscure Mardi, upon the Caspian Sea, and thence over the Mountain Coronus into Aria and Drangina.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the Son of Parmenio was accused, as accessory, if not principal. This Dimnus, having (I know not upon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a young man whom he loved, into the same treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecy, when he heard so foul a matter uttered, began to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to have slain him for security of his own life. So, constrained by fear, he made shew as if he had been won by persuasion; and by seeming at length to like well of the business, he was told more at large what they were that had undertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of rank, whose names Dimnus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned up to Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no sooner freed himself from the company of this Traytor Dimnus, than he acquainted his own Brother Ceballinus with the whole History: whereupon it was agreed between them, that Ceballinus (who might with least suspicion) should go to the Court, and utter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole business; desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promised to do, but did not. Two daies passed, and Philotas never brake with the King about the matter, but still excused himself to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldness bred suspicion, and caused Ceballinus to address himself to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armory, who forthwith brought him to Alexander presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed between Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully persuade himself that this concealment of the treason, argued his hand to have been in the business. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traytor no other question than this: Wherein have I so offended thee, that thou shouldst think Philotas more worthy to be a King than I? Dimnus perceiving when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himself, that he lived no longer, than to give his last groan in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspicion, which his silence might justly breed. His answer was, That when the practice was revealed unto him by Nicomachus, he judging it to be but frivolous, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithal, until he might have better information. This error of his, (if it were only an error) although Alexander, for the notorious services of his Father Parmenio, of his Brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himself, had freely pardoned and given his hand for assurance; yet, by the instigation of Craterus, he again swallowed his Princely promise, and made his enemies his Judges. Curtius gives a note of Craterus in this business; How he persuaded himself, that he could never find a better occasion to oppress his private enemy, than by pretending Piety, and duty towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our own hath given a note as much better, as it is most general, in his Philotas:

*See how these great men cloathe their private
 In these fair colours of the publick good;
 And, to effect their ends, pretend the State,
 As if the State by their affection stood:
 And, arm'd with Power and Princes jealousy,
 Will put the least conceit of discontent
 Into the greatest rank of treacheries,
 That no one action shall seem innocent:
 Tea, valour, honor, bounty shall be made
 As accessories unto ends unjust:
 And even the service of the State must lade
 The needfull self undertaking with distrust;
 So that base wileness, idle Luxury,
 Seem safer far, than to do worthily, &c.*

Now, although it were so, that the King, following the advice of Craterus, had resolved the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very evening of the same night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a Banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to bind him, he cried out upon the King in these words; O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is far more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were urged against him by Alexander himself (for the Kings of Macedonia did in person examine the accusations of treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeed, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a god). That when Alexander wrote unto him concerning the title given him by Jupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but rejoyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the gods, and yet he could not but withal grieve for those that should live under such a one as would exceed the nature of man. This was (saith Alexander) a firm persuasion unto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in despite. See what a strange Monster Flattery is, that can persuade Kings to kill those that do not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude to hear the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vile garments, and bound like a Thief, where he heard himself, and his absent Father, the greatest Captain of the World, accused; his two other Brothers, H.ior and Nicanor having been lost in the present War. He was so greatly oppress'd with grief, as for a while he could utter nothing but tears, and sorrow had so wasted his spirits, as he sank under those that led him. In the end, the King asked him, In what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the King to accuse him; which he did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might understand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perswading the assembly, that he disdain'd the language of his own Country; and so withdrawing himself, left him to his merciless enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the King, who had so sharply inveighed against him, would not vouchsafe to hear his excuse. For not his enemies only were emboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, having discovered the Kings disposition and resolution; contended among themselves, which of them should exceed in hatred towards him. Among many other arguments, which he used in his own defence, this was not the weakest; That when Nicomachus desired to know of Dimmus, what men of mark and power were his partners in the conspiracy (as seeming unwilling to adventure himself with mean and base Companions) Dimmus named unto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntas, and some others; but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly have valued the party, and have encouraged Nicomachus. Indeed, as Philotas said well for himself, it is likely that Dimmus, thereby the better to have heartened Nicomachus, would have named him, though he had never dealt with him in any such practice. And for more certain proof, that he knew nothing of their intents that practised against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, enforced by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him; and it is true, that adversity being seldom able to bear her own burthen, is for the most part found so malicious, as she rather desires to draw others (not always deserving it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoever it were, to avoid the extremity of restless and unnatural torments, devised by his profest enemies Craterus, Cennus, Ephesion, and others, Philotas accused his own self; being perswaded that they would have slain him forthwith. But he failed even in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be laid on flesh and blood, he was forced to deliver, not what he knew, but whatsoever best pleased their ears, that were far more merciless than death it self.

Of this kind of judicial proceeding St. Augustine greatly complaineth, as a matter to be bewailed, saith he, with Fountains of tears, Quid cum in sua causa quisque torquetur; & cum queritur utrum sit nocens, cruciatur; & innocens luit pro incerto scelere certissimas penas: non quia illud commississe detegitur sed quia non commississe nescitur. What shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his own cause, and tormented whilst yet it is in question whether he be guilty; and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certainty: not because he is known to have committed the offence, but because others do not know that he hath not committed it?

It had been enough for Alexanders safety, if Philotas had been put to death without torment, the rest would not much have grieved thereat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemolans, who afterward conspired against him, made the Kings cruelty and delight in blood, the greatest motive of his own ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, speaking of Alexander, saith thus, Crudelitas minime humanum malum est, indignum tam mihi animo; ferina ista rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abiectione homine, in sivefere animal transire; Cruelty is not a humane vice, it is unworthy of so mild a spirit: It is even a beastly rage to delight in blood and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a savage Monster.

For the conclusion of this Tragedy, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philotas made, were to give end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeed; For (saith he) in this case, they that speak truly, or they that deny falsely, come to one and the same end. Now while the Kings hands were yet wet in blood, he commanded that Lyncestes, Son in Law to Antipater, who had been three years in prison, should be slain: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused; others there were that were suspected because they had followed Philotas; but when they had answered for themselves, that they knew no way so direct to win the Kings favour, as by loving those whom the King favoured, they were dismissed. But Parmenio was yet living; Parmenio, who had served with great fidelity as well Philip of Macedonia the Kings Father, as himself; Parmenio, that first opened the way into Asia; that had deprest Attalus the Kings enemy; that had always, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vanguard, that was no less prudent in counsel, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloved of the men of War, and, to say the truth, he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore revenge the death of his Son, though not upon the King (for it was unlikely that he would have dishonoured his fidelity in his eldest age, having now lived threecore and ten years) yet upon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had posset themselves of his affection, it was resolved, that he should be dispatched. Polydamas was employed in this business, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loved best, who (to be short) finding him in Alidia, and having Cleander and other murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the Kings Letters. Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, militie domique clari viri; Multa sine Rege profpere, Rex sine illo nihil magna rei gesserat. This was the end of Parmenio (saith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King; but the King, without him, did never effect any thing worthy of praise.

§. XVIII.

How Alexander subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus was delivered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

WHen these things had end, Alexander went on with his Army, and brought under his obedience the Araspans, or Evergiants; he made Amendes (sometime Darius his Secretary) their Governor, then he subdued the Arachosians, and left Menon to command over them. Here the Army, sometimes led by Parmenio, finds him, consisting of twelve thousand Macedons and Greeks, with whom he past through some cold Regions with difficulty enough. At length he came to the foot of the Mountain Taurus towards the East, where he built a City, which he honoured with his own name, and peopled it with seven thousand of his oldest Macedons, worn with age, and with travels of the War. The Arians, who since he left them were revolted, he subdued again by the industry and valour of Caranus and Erigius. And now he resolves to find out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his coming, prepares to pass over the great River of Oxus, which divides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Governor of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; The Macedonian Army fureth for want of Water, inasmuch as when they came to the River

River of Oxus, there dyed more of them by drinking inordinately, than Alexander had lost in any one Battel against the Perfians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after object unto him) he fought against women, and not against men; and not against their persons, but their shadows. He found on the banks of this great River no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boats, bridges, or raft; but was forced to sew together the hides that covered his carriages, and stuff them with straw, and on them in six days to pass over his Army; which Bessus might easily have distressed, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Army afar off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tygrus, and other passages; and yet now, when this traitorous slave had filled himself a King, he durst not perform any thing worthy of a slave. And therefore those that were nearest unto him, and whom he most trusted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Army, moved both by the care of their own safety, and by the memory of Bessus his treason and cruelty against Darius, bound him in the like manner, that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chain clofed about his neck like a Mastiff-Dog, and so was dragged along to be presented to his Enemy.

In the mean while Alexander was arrived at a certain Town inhabited with Greeks of Asiatium, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before he returned out of Greece; whose Issues had well-near forgotten their Country-language. These most cruelly (after they had received him with great joy) he put to the sword, and destroyed their City. At this place he received Bessus, and having rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that delivered him, he gave the Traytor into the hands of Oxartes, Darius his Brother, to be tormented.

But while he thought himself secure, some twenty thousand Mountainers assaulted his Camp in repelling whom he received a shot in the leg, the arrow-head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horf-litter, sometime by the Horsemen, sometime by the foot.

Soon after he came unto Maracanda, which Petrus Terondinus takes to be Samarland, the regal City of the great Tamerlain. It had in compass threecore and ten furlongs (Curtius saith.) Here he received the Embassadors of the Scythians (called Avians) who offered to serve him.

The Bactrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stirred to rebellion, by the same Spitamenes and Catanes, who had lately delivered into his hands the Traytor Bessus. Many Cities were refolv'dly defended against him, all which, after victory, he defaced and razed, killing all therein. At one of these he received a blow on the neck, which struck him to the ground, and much disabled him for many days after. In the mean while Spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, against whom he employed Menedemus with three thousand foot, and eight hundred horse.

In the heat of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may believe Curtius and others) till he came to the River of Tanais; upon whose bank he built another Alexandria, threecore furlongs in compass, which he beautified with houles within seventeen days after the walls built. The building of this City is said to have been occasion of a War between him and the Scythians; the Scythian King persuading himself, that this new Town was fortified of purpose to keep him under. I do not well understand, why the Scythians, offering war in such terrible manner, that Alexander was judged by his own Souldiers to counterfeit sickness for very fear, should nevertheless make fate for peace: neither find I the reason why Alexander (not intending the Conquest of those Northern desarts, but only the defence of his own bank) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; and a victory described; in pursuit of which the Macedons ran beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his Expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Tragus have greatly mistaken this River, which they call Tanais. For it was the River of Jaxartes, that runs between Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander pass'd over, while Menedemus was employed in the recovery of Samarband: But Tanais, which divides Asia from Europe, is near two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, and the way desart and unknown. So that Alexander had (besides Jaxartes) the great River of Volga, and many others to swim over, ere he could recover Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have discovered with the Army that followed him, if he had employed all the time that he lived in Asia in that travel.

Wherefore it is enough to believe, that the Asiaticque Scythians, making some offer to disturb the erection of his new City, which was like to give some hinderance to their their excursions, were driven away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defensive Arms, easily chafed some ten or twelve miles; which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his journey, like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his lifetime he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went not very far into that waste Country, where he could find nothing but trees and stones, nor other business than to set up a Monument.

Threecore of the Macedonians are said to have been slain, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might easily bein passing a great River, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Camp, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeed it is hardly possible, to set down the numbers of such as perish in Battel: yet Cæsar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the Victors hath been so inquisitive into the greatness of their own success, that Writers have been able to deliver such particulars by credible report, I hold it not unlawful to set down what we find; especially when it serves to give light to the business in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost; the omission of the number which they slew (a thing not usual in Curtius, who forbears nothing that may set out the greatness of Alexander) and the little booty that was gotten, do make it probable, that this War was no better than the reputation of a few roving Tartars (like being yearly performed by the Moscovites, without any host) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was assuring himself of those Scythians bordering upon Jaxartes, he received the ill news that Menedemus was slain by Spitamenes, the Army (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slain, to wit, two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion, and to take revenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kills, burns, and lays waste all before him, not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leaving a new Governor in that Province.

To repair this loss, he received a great supply of nineteen thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria; with all which, and the old Army he returns towards the South, and passeth the River of Oxus; on the South side whereof he built six Towns near each other for mutual succour. But he finds a new start-up Rebel, called Arimazes (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thousand Souldiers, that defended against him a strong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had fought in vain to win by fair words, he made choice of three hundred young men, and promised ten talents to the first, nine to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that could find a way to creep up to the top thereof. This they performed with the loss of some two and thirty of their men, and then made a sign to Alexander, that they had performed his commandment. Hereupon he sent one Copbes to persuade Arimazes to yield the place; who, being shewed by Copbes that the Army of Macedon was already mounted up, yielded simply to Alexander's mercy, and was (with all his kindred) scourged and crucified to death; which punishment they well deserved for neglecting to keep good watch in so dangerous a time. For the place, as seems by the description, might easily have been defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot do, Maas wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected: Of which I will give you an example in a place of our own.

The Island of Sark, joining to Garnsey, and of that Government, was in Queen Maries time surprized by the French, and could never have been recovered again by strong hand, having cattle and corn enough upon the place to feed so many men as will serve to defend it, and being every way so inaccessible, that it might be held against the Great Turk. Yet by the industry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this sort regained. He anchored in the road with one Ship of small burthen, and pretending the death of his Merchant; besought the French, being some thirty in number, that they might bury their Merchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappel of that Isle; offering a present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboard; whereto (with condition that they should not come ahoire with any weapon, nor not so much as with a Knife) the Frenchmen yielded. Then did the Fleming, put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead carcass, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebusses; The French received them at their landing; and searching every of them so narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gave them leave to draw their Coffin up the Rocks with great difficulty; some part of the French took the Flemish Boat, and rowed aboard their Ship, to fetch the commodities promised, and what else else they pleased; but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappel, shut the door to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, set upon the French; they run to the Cliff, and cry to their company aboard the Fleming to come to their succour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings yielded themselves and this place. Thus a Fox-tail doth sometimes help well to piece out the Lyons-skin that else would be too short.

§. XI X.

How Alexander slew his own friends.

AFTER these Sogdian and Seythian Wars, we read of Alexanders killing of a Lion, and other Fivolous matters, and that he committed the Government of Maracanda, and the Country about it, to Clytus, and how he slew him soon after, for valuing the virtue of Philip the Father before that of Alexander the son, or rather because he objected to the King the death of Parmenio, and derided the Oracle of Hammon: for therein he toucht him to the quick, the same being delivered in publick, and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed, had deserved as much at the Kings hands, as any man living had done, and had in particular saved his life, which the King well remembered when he came to himself, and when it was too late. Yet, to say the truth, Clytus his in'olency was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgot whom he offended, so the King in his (for neither of them were themselves) forgot whom he went about to slay: for the grief whereof he tare his own face, and sorrowed so inordinately, as, but for the persuasions of Calisthenes, it is thought he would have slain himself.

Wine begat Fury, Fury matter of Repentance: But preceding mischiefs are not amended by succeeding bewailing: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; obstantem malis conatibus verendum non movet; ubi possedit animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali latebat, emergit: non facit ebrietas vitia, sed probrabit; Drunkenness both kindles and lays open every vice; it removes out of the way that shame which gives impediment unto bad attempts; where wine gets the mastery, all the ill that before lay hidden breaks out: drunkenness indeed rather discovers vices, than makes them.

Soon after this, Spitamenes, who slew Bessus, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife; and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dacoi also seized upon his Fellow-Conspirator Dataphernes, and delivered him up. So Alexander being now freed from all these petty Rebels, disposed of the Provinces which he past over, and went on with his Army into Gabaza, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storm, as he lost in one Tempest a thousand of his Train. From hence he invaded the Sacani, and destroyed their Country. Then came he into the Territory of Cobortani, who submitted himself unto him, feasted him greatly, and presented him with thirty beautiful Virgins, among whom Roxana, afterwards his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians disdained, yet none of them durst use any freedom of speech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, having so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand armed men.

In the mean while he would needs be honored as a god: whereto that he might allure the Macedonians, he employed two pernicious Parasites, Hagis and Cleo; whom Calisthenes opposed: For, among many other honest arguments used to the assembly, he told Cleo, That he thought, that Alexander would disdain the gift of God-head from his Vassals; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the death of those, who in their life time had done the greatest things, yet it never accompanied any one as yet living in the world. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a Banquet, and upon drink (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carousing feast): but that, for the more than many ads by them performed while they lived, they were in future and succeeding ages numbered among the gods. Alexander stood behind a partition, and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunity to be revenged on Calisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a lover of the Kings honor, was yet soon after tormented to death; not for that he had betrayed the King to others, but because he never would condescend to betray the King to himself, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracy against the King made by one Hermolani and others (which they confest) he cauled Calisthenes without confession, accusation or trial, to be torn asunder upon the rack: This deed unworthy of a King, Seneca thus censureth, Hoc est Alexandri crimen eternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum felicitas redimet: Nam quoties quis dixerit, dixerit, Occidit Persarum milia milia; opponitur, & Calisthenem. Quoties dictum erit, Occidit Darium; opponitur, & Calisthenem. Quoties dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenuis vici, ipsum quoque tentavit novis clavisibus, & Insperum ex angulo Thraciae usque ad orientis terminos protulit: dicitur, sed Calisthenem occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla transferit, ex his quae fecit nihil tam magnum erit quam scelus Calisthenis; This is the eternal crime of Alexander, which no vertue nor felicity of his in War shall ever be able to redeem: For as often as any man shall say, He slew many thousand Persians; it shall be replied, he did so, and he slew Calisthenes. When it shall be said, he slew Darius; it shall be replied, and Calisthenes. When it shall be said, he won all as far as the very Ocean, thereon also he adventured with unusual Navies, and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the utmost bounds of the Orient; It shall be said withall, But he killed Calisthenes. Let him have out-gone all the ancient examples of Captains and Kings; none of all his ads make so much to his glory, as Calisthenes to his reproach.

§. XX.

Of Alexanders journey into India. The battle between him and Porus.

WITH the Army before remembered, of one hundred and twenty thousand foot and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselves unto him, he entertained lovingly, the rest he constrained, killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they resisted. He then came before Nisa, built by Bacchus, which after a few dayes was rendered unto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens, filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made feasts for ten dayes together. Now when he had drunk his fill, he went on towards Dadala, and from thence to Acedera, Countreys spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants; by reason whereof, victuals failing, he divides his Army: Platony led one part, Genon another, and himself the rest. They take many Towns, whereof that of greatest fame was Masage, which had in it three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yielded unto him by Cleopha the Queen, to whom again he restored it; at the siege of this City he received a wound in the leg. After this, Nora was taken by Polyperchon, and a Rock of great strength by himself: he was also a passage upon one Eryx, who was slain by his company, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the sum of Alexanders doings in those parts, before such time as he arrived at the River of Indus. Coming to Indus, he found there Ephesban, who (being sent before) had prepared Boats for the transportation of his Army, and ere Alexanders arrival, had perwaded Omphis King of that part of the Country, to submit himself to this great Conquerour. Therefore, soon upon Alexanders coming, Omphis presented himself with all the strength of his Countrey, and six and fifty Elephants, unto him; offering him his service and assistance. He made Alexander know, that he was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abisares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this dis-union to make his own Victory by far the more easie. He presented Alexander with a Crown of Gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withall fourscore Talents of Silver Coyn; which Alexander not only refused, but to shew that he was covetous of glory, not of gold, he gave Omphis a thousand Talents of his own treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abisares, having heard that Alexander had received his enemy Omphis into his protection, resolved to make his own peace also: For, knowing that his own strength did but equal that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference between them, than that which the chance of War gave, he thought it an ill match, when Alexander, who had already beaten under foot all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himself a Party and Head of the quarrel. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandement, that he should attend him at the border of his Kingdom, there to do him homage. But from Porus he received this manly answer; That he would satisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgment he was resolved to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolves to pass over the River Hydaspes, and to find Porus at his own home. Porus attends him on the farther bank with thirty thousand foot, fourscore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troop of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely stayed somewhat longer ere he had seen India. The River was four furlongs broad, which makes half a mile, and withall deep and swift. It had in many Islands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacity. Alexander sent Ptolemy up the River with a great part of the Army, shewing the rest from the view of Porus: who by this device being drawn from his first incamping, sets himself down opposite to Ptolemy, supposing that the whole Army of Macedonia, meant to force their passage there. In the mean while Alexander recovers the farther shore without resistance. He orders his troops, and advanceth towards Porus, who at first rather believes, that Abisares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had been come over Hydaspes to his aid, than that Alexander had past it. But he finds it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with four thousand Horse, and a hundred armed Waggon to encounter him. Each Waggon had in it four to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little use: for there had fallen so much rain, and thereby the fields were so moistened, as the horses could hardly trot. The Scythians and Dabans had the Vanguard, who so galled the Indians, as they brake their rains, and other Furniture, overturning the Waggon, and those in them. Perdicas also gave up the Indian horse-men, and the one and the other were forc'd to recoil. Porus moves forward with the grofs of his Army, that those of his Vanguard scattered might recover his Rear; Alexander being followed with Ephsion, Ptolemy, and Perdicas, took on him to charge the Indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenus or Cnon to invade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus, he directed to break upon Porus his battel of foot, strengthened with Elephants. Porus himself being carried upon one of them, of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Macedonian foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters, being well guarded with the long and strong pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them, as being enraged, they turned head, and ran over the foot that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the advantage of weapon, and by the courage and skillfulness of the Macedonian Captains, the victory fell to Alexander, who also far exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Eastern and Northern Nations, Porus was assailed by his own Confederate and Country-people. Yet for his own person he never gave ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Army, he became a prisoner to the Conquerour, from whom again he received his estate with a great enlargement.

How Alexander finished his Expedition, and returned out of India.

I Forbear to trouble my self and others with a frivolous discourse of Serpents, Apes and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their travels: or of those petty Wars which Alexander made between the overthrow of Porus, and his falling down the River of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better known unto us in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be persuaded to believe, till our own experience had taught us, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seen between London and Stanes.

Our great traveller Mandowile, who died in the year 1372, and had seen so much of the World, and of the East India, we accounted the greatest fabler of the World's yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witness the Monument made of him in the Covent of the Friars Guilmis in Liege, where the Religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honnorable memoire de son Excellence; For an honourable memory of his Excellency, saith Guichardine.

The Countreys towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zarades, Acesines, and the rest fall into the main stream, are now posses'd by the great Mogol the ninth from Tamberlain, who commands all the tract between Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Country towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Acesinon, a Ship of London, suffered shipwrack, in the year 1609. and some of the company travelled over Land till they came to Agra, the same great City (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionysopolis.

Philostratus in the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells us, that those two great Captains (whom Alexander sought by all means to out-fame) when they endeavour'd to subject to them the Oxidrace, a people inhabiting between the Rivers of Hyphasis and Ganger, they were beaten from the

the assault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be understood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in use. For it is now certainly known, that the great Kings of the uttermost East, have had the use of the Cannon many hundreds of years since, and even since their first civility and greatness, which was long before Alexander's time. But Alexander pierc'd not so far into the East. It sufficed, that having already over-wearied his Army, he discovered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River Ganges, was the powerfullst King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than ever to proceed in this discovery and conquest, yet all the art he had, could not persuade the Souldiers to wander over those great Desarts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible unto them than the greatest Army that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perfwasive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, wherunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, devised a pretty trick, wherewith he hoped to beguile posterity, and make himself seem greater than he was. He enlarged his Camp, made greater trenches, greater Cabbins for Souldiers, greater Horse-stalls, and higher Mangers than Horses could feed in. He caused all furniture of men and horses to be made larger than would serve for use, and scattered these Armour's and Bridles about his Camp, to be kept as reliques, and wondered at by the Savages. Proportionable to these he raised up twelve great Altars: to be the monument of his journeys end. This was a ready way to encrease the fame of his greatness; to his greatness it could add nothing save a suspicion, that it was less than is thought, seeing he strove so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned again to the bank of Acesines, and there determined to set up his fleet, where Acesines and Hydaspes encounter; where to testifie by a fuller monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those Rivers two Cities: the one he called Nicæa, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloved Horse Bucepha-

lus. Here again he received a fourth supply of six thousand Ibracian Horse-men, seven thousand Foot; and from his Lieutenant at Babylon five and twenty thousand Armour's, garnished with silver and gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Rivers he was many Towns, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaulting a City of the Oxidracans, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Bevis of Southampton, frivolous and incredible. Finally, he paid down the River with his fleet, at which time also the news came unto him of a rebellion in Badria, and then of the arrival of an hundred Embassadors from a King of India, who submitted himself unto him. He scalated these Embassadors upon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuousity that could be devised, who, soon after their dispatch, returned again with a present of three hundred Horses, one hundred and thirty Waggon, and to each of them four Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, he failed towards the South, passed through many obscure Nations, which did all yield unto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he took in this passage, Samos was one, the Inhabitants wherof fought against him with paysoned swords, with one of which Ptolemy (afterward King of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an herb which Alexander dreamt he had seen in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came near the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies, as they were on a sudden thrust one upon another by the Flood, so on the Ebb they were left on the dry ground, and on the sandy banks of the River, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few dayes observed well the course of the Sea, he past out of the Rivers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned: and the better to inform himself, he sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discover the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Ariannus in the beginning of his sixth Book hath written this passage down the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vells in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were used therein, and other the marvellous provisions made.

Near the out-lets of this River, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteen dayes march from thence recovered Gedrosia, in which passage his Army suffered such misery for want of food, that of a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned alive.

Of Alexanders Riot, Cruelty, and Death.

From Gedrosia, Alexander led his Army into Carmania, and so drawing near to Persia, he gave himself wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice be hateful enough in it self, yet it always inflamed this King to Cruelty. For (saith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the feast: for Aspates, one of his Provincial Governours, he commanded to be slain; so as neither did the excess of voluptuousness qualifie his cruelty, nor his cruelty binder in ought his voluptuousness.

While he refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of five thousand foot and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had been employed in the Killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers, great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Provinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outrageous, as Alexander was perswaded, that had they not altogether despaired of his return out of India, they durst not have committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembering the virtue of him, whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chief, with six hundred Souldiers by them employed, were delivered over to the Hang-man: every one rejoicing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an Island rich in gold, and of other strange things; whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discovery: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and find the King at Babylon.

As he drew near to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now called Chalquera: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orsines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuch in special favour with the King, was neglected; he not only practised certain loose fellows to witness against Orsines, that he had robbed Cyrus Tomb, for which he was condemned to dye; but he assisted the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradites to be slain, suspecting his greatness. Caperas (saith Curtius) esse praecipue ad representanda supplicia, item ad deterrienda credenda; He began head-longly to shed blood, and believe false reports. It is true, that he took a way to make all men weary of his Government, seeing cruelty is more fearful, than all adventures that can be made against it.

At this time it is said, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himself, when he had lived threecore and thirteen years. Whether herein he followed the custom of his Country, being an Indian, or sought to prevent the grief and incommody of elder age, it is uncertain: but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-thewing Alexanders death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada he came to Susa, where he married Statira Darius his eldest Daughter, giving her younger sister to his beloved Ephesius, and fourcore other Persian Ladies to his Captains. There were six thousand guests invited to the feast, to each of which he gave a cup of gold. Here there came unto him three thousand young Souldiers, out of his conquered Provinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon, having lavishly consumed the moneys in his keeping, got him going with five thousand Talents, and six thousand hired Souldiers; but he was rejected in Greece, and there slain. Alexander greatly rejoiced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stir: yet he sent commandment, that they should again receive their banished men, whereunto (fearfull of his indignation) all submitted themselves (except the Athenians) though they resolved, that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this, there followed a marvellous discontentment in his Army, because he had resolved to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no longer endure the travel of War, and to keep the rest in Asia. He used many Orations to lase them, but it was in vain during the tempest of their fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawn to the Land with a twine-thred, when they have tumbled a while; so are the unconside rate multitude easily conducted when their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licensed to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gave the Lieutenantship of Macedon, Thessaly, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his absence, discharged the trust committed unto him with great fidelity, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainly, if Alexander had not taken counsel of his cups, he would have cast some better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a stronger reason for his remove, than to have employed him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the War being now at an end. For Antipater saw nothing in this remove, but the Kings disposition to send him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, do not stand in doubt of every man ill-affected, though valiant: but there is a kind of Kingly courage, compounded of hardiness and understanding, which is many times so fearful unto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After he had sent for Antipater, he made a journey into Media to settle things there; where Ephesius, whom he favoured most of all men, dies. The King, according to the greatness of his love, laments his loss, hangs his Physician, and bestows upon his Monument twelve thousand talents: After which he returns to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but sent; and not to excuse himself, but to free himself. For if we believe Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gain-say) Antipater by his Sons, Cassander, Philip, and Lolla, who waited on Alexanders cup, gave him poison; Thessalus (who was of the Conspiracy) having invited him to a drinking-feast of purpose. For after he had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drink stronger than Hercules himself, he quitted the World within a few dayes.

Certainly the Princes of the World have seldom found good, by making their Ministers over-great, and thereby suspicious to themselves. For he that doth not acknowledge himself to be a debt, but is perswaded, that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassals, will never please himself with the price given. The only restorative, indeed, that strengthens it, is the goodness and virtue of the Prince, and his liberality makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be observed. It may be, that Antipater, having commanded two or three Kingdoms ten or twelve years, knew not how to play any other part; no more than Cesar did, after he had so long a time governed the Gauls, where he utterly forgot the art of obedience. A most cruel and ungrateful Traitor Antipater was, if Curtius do not belie him: For though he feared some ill measure upon his remove (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Calisthenes, having been so lately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had resolved to have given him some other great Government in Asia: The old Souldiers thence returned, having perchance desired to be governed by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former War.

§. XXIII.

Of Alexanders person and qualities.

Howsoever it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot be excused, no more than his vanity to be esteemed the Son of Jupiter, with his excessive delight in drink and drunkenness, which others make the cause of his feaver and death. In that he lamented his want of enterprising, and grieved to consider what he should do when he had conquered the World, Augustus Cesar found just cause to deride him, as if the well-governing of so many Nations and Kingdoms, as he had already conquered, could not have offered him matter more than abundant, to busie his brains withall. That he was both learned, and a lover of learning, it cannot be doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his first Book of the Advancement of Learning, hath proved it sufficiently. His liberality, I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gave a whole City to one of his servants, he, to whom it was given, did out of modesty refuse it, as disproportionate to his fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to give: Seneca; Animosa vox videtur & regia, cum sit stultissima. Nihil enim per se quinquaginta. L. d. Ba. deceat. Refert quid, cui, quando, quare, ubi, &c. sine quibus facti ratio non constabit; habetatur personarum & dignitatum proportio, & cum sit ubique virtutis modus, aequè peccat quod excedit, quàm quod deficit; It seems a brave and Royal speech, whereas indeed it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it self becoms a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which considerations, no act can be approved. Let honours be proportioned unto the persons: for whereas virtue is ever limited by measure, the excess is as sanity as the defect.

For his Person, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man's disposition, taken by it self, not much to be admired: For I am resolved, that he had ten thousand in his Army as daring as himself. Surely, if adventurous natures were to be commended simply, we should confound that virtue with the hardness of Thieves, Ruffians, and Mastiff-Dogs. For certainly it is no way praiseworthy, but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawful enterprises, in which we are employed for the service of our Kings, and Common-weals.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other troublers of the world, who have bought their glory with so great destruction and effusion of blood, I think him far inferior to Cæsar, and many other that lived after him, seeing he never undertook any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted: nor was ever encountered with any Army of which he had not a most mastering advantage, both of Weapons and Commanders, every one of his Fathers old Captains but far exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seems Fortune and Destiny (if we may use those terms) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his own, both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the yoke, and Kingdoms that invited and called in their own Conquerours. For conclusion, we will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Son, gives this judgement of them: Quod non minores fuisse pestes mortalium, quam inundatio, qua plannum omne perisum est, quam conflagratio, qua magna pars animantium exaruit; They were no less plagues to mankind, than an overthrow of waters, drowning all the level; or some burning drought, whereby a great part of living creatures are scorched up.

CHAP. III.

The Reign of Arideus.

§. I.

Of the Question about Succession to Alexander.

THE death of Alexander left his Army (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Gyant Polyphemus, having lost his only eye. For that which is reported in Fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance uneffectual, and harmful chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (under the divine ordinance) were partly the uncertainty of Title to succession in the Kingdom of Macedon, partly the stubborn pride of Alexander himself, who thinking none worthy to be his heir, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leaving every one to his own fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soon taught unto spirits reflecting upon their own worth, when the reverence of a greater object failed.

It hath formerly been shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) governing in Macedon, as Protector, assumed unto himself the Kingdom, not rendering it unto Amynias, (the Son of his elder Brother Perdiccas) when he grew to mans estate; but only bestowing upon him in marriage a Daughter of his own: by which bond, and much more by his own proper strength, he assured the Crown, unto himself: Amynias never attempting ought against Philip; though (with price of his life) he did against Alexander in the beginning of his reign. Wherefore Eurydice, the sole issue of this marriage, ought in reason to have been acknowledged Queen after Alexander; as having better Title thereunto, than either He or Philip had, when they lived, unless (peradventure) some Law: of that Nation forbid the reign of Women. But the excellent virtue of these two Princes had utterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their own bodies: and so great were their Conquests, that Macedon it self was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deserving to be laid in balance against the demand of their posterity, had they left any able able to make challenge of the Royal Seat.

Alexander having taken many Wives, had issue by none of the principal of them. Barsine the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian, had born unto him a young Son: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnly married) was left by him great with child. But the baseness of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alledged in Barr of Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) have wrought out their own ends, under the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra a Sister of Alexander, widow to the King of Epirus, and Arideus his base Brother (Son to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may give suspicion, that either Law or Custom had made that Sex incapable of the Sovereignty: Arideus (besides his baseness) was neither for person nor quality fit to rule as King; yet upon him the election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counsellors having overlaboured their disagreeing wits in devising what was best, were content for very weariness to take what comes next to hand.

Ptolomy (soon after King of Egypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the half Persian brood, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should be given to the Captains; that going for Law, which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so far was he from acknowledging any one as true Heir to the Crown.

This Ptolomy was called the Son of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who having used the company of Asinios Ptolomys Mother, delivered her in marriage to Lagus, being great with child. Therefore, whether it were so, that he hoped well to work his own fortune out of those dissensions, which are incident unto the consultations of many ambitious men, equal in place, forcing them at length to redeem their quiet with subjection to one, deserving regard by his blood, and trust for his even carriage; or whether he desired only to get a share to himself, which could not have come to pass, had all been given to one: plain enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Arideus before himself: and therefore gave such counsel as fitted his own and other mens purposes. Yea, this device of his took place indeed, though not in form as he had propounded it; For, it was in effect all one, to have assembled at Alexanders empty Chair, as Pto- lomy had conceived the form of their consultations, or to sit in the Chair such a King as Arideus, no wiser than the Chair it self. Also the Controversies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captains; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterfeit shews of dissimbling aspirers do often take check by the plain-dealing of them who dare to go more directly to work: so was it like to have fared with Ptolomy and the rest, when Arifonius, another of the Captains, interpreted the very words of Alexander, saying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, as designing Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) he delivered his ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should be disposer of his own purchases: and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plain enough, so long as no man would interpose another construction: every one being uncertain how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their love, or because they would not of the latest, urged Perdiccas to take upon him the estate Royal. He was no stranger to the Royal blood; yet his birth gave him not such reputation, as the great favour of his dead King, with whom he had been very inward, and that especially since the death of Epephion (a powerfull Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his own worth he might well be commended, as a good man of War, and one that had given much proof of his private valour. But very furly he was: which quality (joynted with good fortune) carried a shew of Majesty: being checkt with misadventure, it was called by a true name, Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present business a foolish overweening did him as great harm, as it had been great happiness to have succeeded Alexander. For, not content to have the acclamation of the Soldiers, approving the sentence of Arifonius, he would needs counterfeit modesty; thinking that every one of the Princes would have intreated him to take the weighty burden of an Empire, which would be the less envious, the more solemnity he used in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that feigneth himself a Sheep, may chanceto be eaten by a Wolf. Melager, (a man by nature envious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) took advantage of his irresolute behaviour, and very bitterly inveighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, That whosoever was Heir to the Crown, the soldiers ought to be heirs to the Treasure; and therefore he invited them, who who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captains were left alone, far enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedy of spoil, thronged about Meleager.

§. II.

The Election of Aridæus, with the troubles thereabout arising; the first Division of the Empire.

During this up-roar, mention was made of Aridæus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, until at last it grew to the voice of the Army. Meleager having withdrawn himself tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so fair an occasion to make himself great: therefore he produced Aridæus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, investing him in Alexander's Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vain: for they could not resolve what course to follow, rejecting this. Only Pythion, a hot-headed man, took upon him to proclaim the Son of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsel which Perdiccas at first had given, appointing Perdiccas and Leonatus his Protectors. But the child was not yet born, which made that attempt of Pythion vain. Finally, Perdiccas with fix hundred men, and Ptolomy with the Kings Pages, took upon them to defend the place where Alexander's body lay: but the Army conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he listed, easily brake in upon them, and enforced them to accept Aridæus for their Sovereign Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captains, a reconciliation was propounded, and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leonatus, who was of Royal blood, a goodly Gentleman, and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but standing upon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any commotion that should happen among the Infantry. The King (who was governed by Meleager) commanded, or gave leave to have Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their coming was not unexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such gravity, that they departed honestlier than they came; being sorry for their bad enterprise. Upon the news of this attempt, the Camp was in an up-roar, which the King seeking to pacifie, wanted authority, as having newly got the Crown by them, and holding it by their courtesy. The matter it self afforded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said that no harm was done, for Perdiccas was alive: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which he imputed to Meleager; abandoning the surest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, until the King by offering to resign his estate unto them, renewed out of their pity that favourable affection, which had moved them to set him up as the first.

Perdiccas having now joyned himself with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all provision of victuals from the City. But after sundry Embassies passing between the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to have the Authors of sedition given up into their hands;) the King, that Meleager might be joyned with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in government of the Army) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should have done well to consider, That such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to give him a principal place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treachery lurked under their great facility. General peace was renewed, and much love protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had been in Alexander's time: but no longer now did the same heart give it life; and windy spirits they were which moved in the arteries. False reports were given out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his own disgrace, but in such terms as might seem to have proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, took it as an injury done to himself; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a lover of peace) did well approve the motion; and therefore agreed that a general Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was mischievously laid. Had Meleager given way to seditious rumours, he must needs have incurred the general hatred of all, as a five of diffention, and thereby with a publick approbation might have been cut off, as having often offended in that kind; his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now seeking redress of these disorders, he halleted his own ruine, by a less formal, but more speedy way. This kind of Muster was very solemn, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleaning the Army. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries were each according to their quality set in array, apart from others, as if they had been of sundry sorts, met at adventure: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to the direction of their several Captains. But at that time the great battel of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the countenance of the Horse and Elephants beginning to give charge upon them, was such, as discovered no jesting pastime, nor good intent. Kings were always wont to fight among the horse-men: of which custom Perdiccas made great use that day, to the utter confusion of his enemies. For Aridæus was always governed by him, who for the present had him in possession. Two or three days before, he fought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas up and down about the footmen, commanding them to deliver unto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast unto the Elephants, and by them slain, in the presence of the King (who should have defended them) and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especial friends. Having therefore kept himself quiet a while, as unwilling to give offence to them that had the advantage; when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they sent and slew him.

The Army being thus corrected, was led into the City, where a new Council of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leaving to Aridæus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought upon; whose body having been feven days neglected, was opened and embalmed by the Egyptians: no sign of poison appearing, how great soever the suspicion might be. The charge of his burial was committed to Aridæus, one of the Captains, who was two years preparing of a great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coffers of his friends being laid in the ground before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a City of his own building, in Egypt.

§. III.

The beginning of the Lamiar War.

Whilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Cratæus, two principal Noblemen, and inferior to none of Alexander's followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were buried in Greece with a War, which the Athenians more bravely than wisely had begun in Alexander's life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, upon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greeks (few excepted) should be restored unto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Estates, and therefore thought so to provide, that in every City he would have a sure party, But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he won by this proud injunction. His pleasure indeed was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retaining more than was needful of their ancient spirits, forbore the execution of this Decree in their Dominions; so did also the Asiatians who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them took Arms, but seemed to bear themselves, as men that had done no more than they might well justify by reason: nevertheless to prevent the worst, the Athenians gave secret instructions to Leosthenes, a Captain of theirs, willing him to levy an Army, but in his own name, and to keep it in a readiness for their use. This was no hard thing for Leosthenes to do: great numbers of Greek Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian War in poor estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captains. Of these he had gathered up eight thousand, when the certain news was brought of Alexander's death: at which the City of Athens declared it self, and more

honorably than wisely, proclaimed War against the Macedonians for the liberty of Greece. Hereupon Leofthene drew in the Ætolians and some other Estates, gave battle to the Ætolians, who sided with Antipater, and overthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in adherents, that Antipater (arming in all haste, yet supplementing his own strength) was fain to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vain than the fears and hopes of men, flunning or pursuing their destinies a farce, which deceive all mortal wisdom, even when they seem near at hand. One month was scarcely past, since nothing so heavily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the return of Craterus into Macedon; which he then feared as death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured unto him, was sent into Macedon to convey home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) and to succeed Antipater in the government of Macedon and Greece. The suspicions were strong that he had a privy charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better; which was, That Antipater should be sent unto the King, as Captain of the young Souldiers, newly to be belived in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes give out speeches, testifying his own jealousy and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruel Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexander's Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeed were mean persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour was such, as could find rebellious purposes (for so he interpreted even lewd government) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who having sitted Vice-roy ten years in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of to sell a Master, and the envy of a Court, wherein they had been his inferiours, which would now repine to see him their equal. Therefore whether his fear drew him to prevention, working first the Kings death by poison, given by his Son Isolans; Alexander's Cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth untill opportunity had changed it into the passion of revenge, which was cruelly performed by his son Cassander; great cause of much fear he had; which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few years.

At the present, Craterus was sent for, and all the Captains of companies lying near, solicited to make haste. Not without cause: For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteen thousand foot, and fix hundred horse; which Muster was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Country being emptied into Asia. The Thessalians indeed who had long stood firm for Philip and Alexander, who also were the best horsemen of Greece, furnished him with very brave troops, that might have done great service, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thessaly try the fortune of a battle with Leofthene; rather (as may seem) fearing the increase of his enemies power, and rebellion of the Greeks, (were they not cheekt at the first) than presuming on his strength. For Leofthene had of Athenians, Ætolians, and Mercenaries, two and twenty thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians and Thracians: of horse he brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but over-strong he was that way also, when once the Thessalians had revolted unto him. So Antipater lost the day; and his loss was such, that he neither was able to keep the field, nor to make a safe retreat into his own Country; therefore he fled into the Town of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things necessary to bear out a siege. Thither did Leofthene follow him, present him battle again, and upon refusal close up the Town with Earth-works, and a Wall. There will we leave him for a while, travelling in the last honorable enterprize that ever was undertaken by that great City of Athens.

§. I. V.

How Perdiccas employed his Army.

King Aridemus living under the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his own Province, kept an naked Court: all his greatness consisting in a bare Title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make use of him. Perdiccas had no Province of his own peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his Government. A stronger Army than any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that unsettled condition of things to make better worth to him than many Provinces could have been. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander; yet about the same time he either married Nicea the daughter of Antipater, or made such love to her as blinded their eyes, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth King of that Country, had continued faithful to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his re-fathers, even from Pharnaces the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Atossa sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancestors had (indeed) been oppressed by the Persians: but what Fortune took from them at one time, Virtue restored at another, and their faithful Princes had much increased all. But now in the fatal Period of so great an Empire, with much wisdom, and (Darius being slain) with sufficient honor, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Persian room. This he did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater business wherein to entertain his Army, found it expedient both for the honor of the Empire, to take that in-land-Kingdom, surrounded with Provinces of the Macedonian conquest, and for his own particular, to have one opportune place of sure retreat, under the government of a steadfast friend. Therefore he entered Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field 30000 foot, and 15000 horse (a strong Army, had it not encountered a stronger, and better trained) won the victory, and thereby the whole Kingdom. But with much cruelty did he use the victory: for having taken Ariarathes prisoner, with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light upon, and so delivered that Province to Eumenes, whom of all men living he trusted most. Another part of his forces he had committed to Pythion, rather as to the most honorable of such as remained about him, than as to the most assured. Pythion was to subdue the Greeks rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. About twenty thousand foot, and 3000 horse they were (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander to bridle the barbarous nations, were soon wary of their unpleasant habitations, and the rude people, among whom they lived: and therefore took advantage of the present troubles to seek unto themselves a better fortune. Against these Pythion went, more desirous to make them his own, than to destroy them: which intent of his Perdiccas discovering, did both give him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giving the spoils of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoined it upon Pythion's Captains (his own creatures) that they should ice his commandment executed. These directions for use of the victory, might have proved needless; so uncertain was the victory itself. A Captain of the Rebels commanding over three thousand, corrupted by Pythion, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtful) retire without necessity to a hill not far off. This dismayed the rest, and gave the day to Pythion: who being far enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting unto them their lives and liberty, under condition of laying down their arms; and hereupon he gave them his faith. Being Master of these companies, he might well have a good opinion of his own power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himself as free Lord of any Territory: He had thirteen thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides the new Companions, whom needless fear without great loss had caused to leave the field: but in true estimation, all the greatness whereof Pythion might think himself assured, was (and soon appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Pythion, levied; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enjoined to give assistance to that business; and by virtue of the precept given unto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all those poor men who had yielded themselves; leaving Pythion as naked as he came forth to return unto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mighty above the mighty, and had fair leisure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himself Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for fear of opposition. How it succeeded, will appear when the Lamian War taketh ending.

§. V.

The process of the Lamian War.

WE left Antipater hardly besieged, wanting means to free himself without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so soon as he expected, he came to parley with Leofthene, and would have yielded unto any terms of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victory, do seldom limit their desires. Leosthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himself to discretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded over them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremity, from which as yet he was far enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Town, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingering War the Ætolians (whether weary of sitting still at a siege, or having business which they pretended at home) took their leave, and returned into their own Country. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found means to fallly out upon his enemies to their great loss: for many were slain, and Leosthenes himself among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Town. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved, their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deal with the Greeks in open fight. Craterus was long in coming. Lysimachus, who was nearest at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his own, leading no more than four thousand foot, and two thousand horse, against Senthas the Thracian King, who brought into the field above four times that number; and though Lysimachus, not without loss, had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leontatus was earnestly solicited by Antipater's friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the government of Phrygia the less, and was able to raise an Army of more than twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; whether levied out of his Province, or appointed unto him out of the main Army, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the journey into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come. For Cleopatra had written unto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chief City of Macedon, and very kindly offering her self to be his Wife; which letters he kept not so close as had been requisite, and therefore brought himself into great suspicion, that soon ended with his life. Antiphibus, chosen General by the Athenians in place of Leosthenes, hearing of his approach, forsook the siege of Lamia, and took the ready way to their great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to give them an evil welcome home, before Antipater and they should joyn in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Ætolians) the advantage of Leontatus in horse, by the odds of two thousand Thesalians; in other things he was equal with him; a cause he thought himself Superior, in the fortune of that day he proved so: for he won a great victory (chiefly by virtue of the Thesalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leontatus himself; who fighting valiantly, was driven into a marish piece of ground, where he found his death, which he desperately had fought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his nativity. He was the first of Alexanders Captains which dyed in battle; but all, or most of the rest shall follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did never any thing laudable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weak to renew the fight, and too proud to flee. They betook themselves to high grounds unfit for service on horseback, and so abode in the sight of the enemy that day; the day following, Antipater with his men came into their Camp, and took the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seek to determine the matter quickly by another battle. But still Antipater kept himself on ground of advantage; which gave more than reasonable confidence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. This wretchedness (incorrigible in an Army of Voluntaries) was very inexcusable; (seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians, labouring to have made themselves once again Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatal captivity of Greece came on, of which the never could be delivered unto this day. Craterus with a strong Army having made great marches from Cilicia, passed over into Europe, and coming into Thessaly, joyned himself with Antipater. The forces of Leontatus, Antipater, and Craterus being joyned in one, contained forty thousand weightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse; in foot, eighteen thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphibus labour to avoid the necessity of a battle, until such time as the Towns confederate should return unto the Camp those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in coming, and and Antipater so urgent upon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the victory: for the Thesalians had the upper hand, and held it, until such time as they perceived their battels (over-laid with multitude) retire unto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, having little else to boast of, considering that with the loss of an hundred and thirty men, they had only purchased the death of some five hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great use made: For the Greeks, as not subject unto the full command of one General, and being every one desirous to preserve his own estate and City: concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a subtle Artificer, and well understanding their aptness to division, refused to hearken to any general composition, but willed every City to deal apart for it self. The intent of his device was so apparent, that it was rejected: the Greeks choosing rather to abide the coming of their assistants, whose unreasonable carelessness betrayed the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging and winning some Towns in Thessaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieve, wearied that Nation from attending any longer upon other mens unlikely hopes, with their own assured and present calamity.

of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. of Demosthenes his death.

THE Thesalians falling off, all the rest soon followed severally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward, inviting such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Ætolians held out. Little favour could they hope for, having been Authors of this tumult, and their fear was not great; the feat of the war being far from them. But the celerity of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who fate still at Athens, devising upon courses of prosecuting the War to come, which came to their doors before their consultation could find issue. He was ready to enter upon their Frontiers; they had no ability to resist, and were as heartless as friendsless. All that remained was to send Embassadors, desiring peace upon some good terms: necessity enforcing them to have accepted even the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosophers, were chief of this Embassage; Phocion, as the most honorable; Demades, as a strong persuader (both of them well respected by Antipater;) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdom, gravity of manners, and virtue; but all these ornaments conflicting in speculation, and therefore of less regard, when their admiration was to cost them much in real effects.

Antipater calling to mind the pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the War past, to pay a fine, and entertain a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the government of the City to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a convenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Commonwealth was given; a number great enough to retain the name and form of a Democracy. But the rascal multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to get their livings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giving their voices, cried out, that this was a meer Oligarchy, the violent usurpation of a few inroaching upon the publick right. These turbulent fellows (of whom King Philip had been wont to say, That war to them was peace, and peace war) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gave them lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withal for satisfying his own suspicions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others, to be slain. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, been forborn, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have passed for very mild; whereas now, all such as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or have surrendered their judgements to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that ever did speak and write, condemn him utterly, calling him a bloody Tyrant. Such grace and reputation do the Learned Arts find in all Civil Nations, that the evil done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soever otherwise it be, or honorably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there there did Archias (lent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) find him, and gently perswaded him to leave the place; but no: so prevailing, he threatened violence. Then Demoisthenes entreating a little respite, as it had been to write somewhat, secretly took poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died: rather choosing to do the last execution upon himself, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable perhaps in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battle, howsoever valiant in perswading to enterprizes, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loved money well, and had great sums given him by the Perfians, to encourage him, in finding work for the Macedonians at home. Neither did he ill (me thinks) in taking from the Perfians which loved not his Country, great reward, for speaking such things as tended to his Countries good; which he did not cease to procure, when the Perfians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honorable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) believe Lucian, who tells us, That it was Antipaters purpose to have done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a stedfast enemy to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chief command was left in the hands of Phocion, a virtuous man, and lover of his Country, yet applying himself to the necessity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the City much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free-men, yet favourable to the vanquished) he endeavoured carefully to preserve.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawn from their Ætolian wars into Asia. The grounds of the first civil war between the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthened their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the Ætolians, whose poverty was not so easily daunted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerful State of Athens had been. Their Country was rough and mountainous, having many places of great fastness, into which they conveyed such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for War: with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obstinacy did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their virtals held out. But when Craterus had shut up all passages, and utterly debarred them of relief, then were they put to a miserable choice; either to descend from their strong holds, and fight upon equal ground, with unequal numbers, or to endure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no long resistance; or to yield themselves to the Macedonians, who, incensed by the loss of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave so stubborn enemies in places which might give confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremity much fineness of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt consideration of that only which at the present is in hand. These Ætolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies daily molested them: wherefore as yet they thought upon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For such news came out of Asia into the Macedonians Camp as made Antipater and Craterus think every hour a month, till they had rid their hands of these Ætolians, giving them whatsoever conditions they would ask: yet with purpose to call them to severer account; yea, to root them out of Greece by death, or by captivity, when once they should have settled the affairs of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is disposer: in whose high Counsel it was ordained, that this poor Nation should continue a troublesome bar to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchy) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Provinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so far from taking effect, that it served merely as an introduction to all the civil wars ensuing.

The grounds of the Asiaticque Expedition, which did set the world in an uproar, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captains the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient pre-eminence, and the present rule which he bore in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloved, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Army. Next unto these had Perdiccas been; whom the advantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equal, or superior, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were, to have comforted with these two, and to have been with them a third partner in the Government of all; to which purpose he entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that gale of wind which bore him up, he began to take wing and soar quite another way. Arideus was a very simple man, yet served well enough to wear the title of that Majestie, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become Proprietary, the practice was more severe than had been in the days of Alexander: the desire to seem terrible, being very familiar with weak Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other means of preserving themselves from contempt, and of giving such a fiery lustre to their actions, as may dazzle the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poor Greeks in the higher Asia were all put to the sword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath already been shewed. The Phidians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfeit Alexanders. One City of theirs was utterly razed; the children sold for slaves, and all the rest massacred. The Isaurians, by this example grown desperate, when after two or three days trial they found themselves unable to continue the defence, locked themselves into their houses, and set the Town on fire, into the flame whereof the young men did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

These exploits being performed, the Army had no other work than to sift the ashes of the burnt City for gold and silver; but Perdiccas had business of greater importance troubling his brains. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to sit still without employment, letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilst others grew great, and took deep root in their several Provinces. He purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, under pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the seat of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings presence would make the Offices of his Vice-Roys (during the time) actually void; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of private men, and only Perdiccas holding authority, the march with Cleopatra might easily be made. So should greatness meet with a good title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomy might give, who held Egypt well fortified with men, but much better with love of the people; yet if the business prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomy would follow of himself, or be driven to come to reason. Antigonum likewise then governing in Phrygia, a busie-headed man, and ill affected to the side, was to be looked into and made away, for fear of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceived in so thinking. Antigonum was as good a man of War, as deep a judgement, as high a spirit, and as great an undertaking, as any of Alexanders Captains. His employments had been less than some of theirs, which made him all the less respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for he valued himself by his own worth, not by the opinions of other men; with careful attention had he watched Perdiccas, and sounded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discover. For Perdiccas having with a jealous eye pryed into the demeanor of Antigonum, and finding him no way fit for his turn, caused him to be charged with such accusations, as might suffice to take away his life, especially by a Judge that sought his death. This device Antigonum would not seem to perceive, but prepared himself in shew to make answer, indeed, to make escape; which easily he did, putting himself and his Son Demetrius aboard of some Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with such tidings as finished the Ætolian War before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonum made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceive their own danger: so his flight gave Perdiccas to understand that his intentions were laid open, and must now be justified by the sword. Therefore he prepared as fast as he could, not only for defence, but (as having on his side the Kings name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing slack in providing to encounter him. Ptolomy being advertised of these proceedings, and considering how nearly they concerned him, sided with Antipater. To his Government of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chief Citizens; and now in the midst of these garboyls he celebrated the funeral of Alexander with great solemnity, purchasing thereby to himself much good will and many partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Army coming against him.

Perdiccas his voyage into Egypt, and his death.

P*erdiccas*, uncertain which way to bend his main power, at length resolved to set upon Ptolomy; leaving Eumenes to keep to his life, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering upon Europe.

It may seem strange, that he did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomy could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomy; or believed that Craterus would not be ready for him soon enough. Sure it is, that he took a bad course and made it worse with ill handling.

Ptolomy by his sweet behaviour allured many to his party, without help of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of iniquity, which never fails to be rewarded with hatred; which is truly defined, An affection founded upon opinion of an unjust contempt. The whole story of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relation: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilful man) tired his followers, and wasted them in hard enterprises without success. His most forceable attempt was upon a little Town, called the Camels Wall: thither he marched by night, with more haste than good speed; for Ptolomy preventing him, did put himself into the place, where behaving himself not only as a good Commander, but as a stout Soldier, he gave the foil to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with loss, after a vehement, but vain assault, continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another journey (which was his last) and came to the divisions of Nile, over against Memphis. There with much difficulty he began to pass over his Army into an Island, where he meant to incamp. The current was strong, the water deep, and hardly fordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants above the passage, to break the violence of the stream, and his horsemen beneath it, to take up such as were carried away by swiftness of water. A great part of his Army being arrived on the further bank, the channel began to wax deep; so that whereas the former companies had waded up to the chin, they who should have followed could find no footing. Whether this came by the rising of the water, or flitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feet of so many Men, Horses, and Elephants) no remedy there was, but such as had passed must repass again, as well as they might: for they were too weak for the enemy, and could not be relieved by their fellows. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the River, wherein above two thousand of them perished, a thousand were devoured by Crocodiles, a miserable spectacle even to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swim, recovered the Camp; many were carried down the stream, and driven to the contrary bank, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Soldiers against their General, giving liberty to their tongues, which long time had concealed the evil thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, news came from Ptolomy, which did set them in an uproar. Ptolomy had not only shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands alive, but performed all rights of Funeral to the dead carcases, which the River had cast upon his side: and finally, sent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not only move the common Soldiers, but made the Captains fall to mutiny, thinking it unreasonable to make war upon so virtuous and honorable a person, to fulfil the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, using them like slaves. The sedition growing strong, wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Pythion was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which he had suffered by his procurement, after the victory upon the rebellious Greeks. Pythion had lived in honorable place about Alexander; he was in the division of the Provinces made Governor of Media; he had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equal to him, had nevertheless been scornfully used by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captains, and a good part of the Horse, which consisted of the Gentry (the footmen having declared themselves before) he entered the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ran upon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud misgoverning authority of Perdiccas. He might have lived as great as himself; yea, peradventure master of all, had he not been too masterly over those which were already his.

The next day Ptolomy came into the Camp, where he was joyfully received; he excused himself of things past, as not having been Author, or given cause of the War, and was easily believed: the favour of the Army being such towards him, that needs they

they would have made him Protector in the room of Perdiccas. But this he refused. It was an Office fit for one that would seek to increase his greatness with his trouble. Ptolomy was well enough already; wherefore, for his own quiet he forbore to accept it, and for their well-deserving of him, he procured that honourable charge to Pythion, and to Aridam the Captain, who having had some companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the solemnities of Alexander's Funerals, did with them adhere to him against Perdiccas.

In the midst of these businesses came news of two great Victories obtained by Eumenes; which news, had they arrived two or three dayes sooner, had been entertained with joyfull acclamations; and would have given such reputation to Perdiccas, as had caused both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to have accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings coming in ill time, when death had stopped the ears which would have given them welcome, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Victories of Eumenes in the lower Asia.

BEFORE we proceed in the relation of things happening about the person of the King, it is meet that we speak of those businesses in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexterity, whilst Perdiccas was occupied in the Egyptian Wars. Alcetas the Brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had received command from Perdiccas to be assitant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat answer that he would not; alleging the backwardness of his men to bear Arms against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make fair shew, but inwardly he repined at the precedence given to Eumenes, as thinking himself the better man. Eumenes discovering, through the counterfeited looks of Neoptolemus, the mischief lurking in his heart, wisely dissembled with him, in hope to win him by gentle behaviour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when belittled upon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortify himself, that he might stand upon his own strength, he raised out of the Countries under his jurisdiction, about six thousand Horse, giving many privileges to such as were serviceable, and training them well up. Not without great need. For when upon advertisement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellepont) for the invasion of his Provinces, he willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power; Neoptolemus did (indeed) advance, but in hostile manner, though unprovoked, presented him Battel. Neoptolemus had secretly covenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the Conquest of Asia, which now intending to perform, he was shamefully disappointed. For, though his foot-men, being all Macedonian, had much the better, and prevailed far upon Eumenes his Battels; yet were his horse driven out of the field, and himself compelled, with a few of them, to run away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men to be charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, that casting down their Pikes, they cried for mercy, and gladly took their oath to do him faithful service. Antipater and Craterus endeavoured with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their Society, who contrariwise offered himself as a mean of reconciliation, between Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearly loved; professing withall his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which he had undertaken to maintain.

Whilst these negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crew to Antipater, and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe (at which foolish railing they laughed) but extolling the virtue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations; assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appear, or that his voice were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Camp, the Victory was won; for they would all forthwith revolt unto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to give him aid against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might have the leading of the Army to be sent. Their own affections did easily lead them to condescend to his motion: a good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevail as much as the force which he drew along. For he had in the midst of Alexander's vanities, when others (imitating their King) betook themselves to the Persian fashions of garments and customs, retained the ancient Macedonian form of behaviour, and apparel; whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld their new tricks of Asia with discontented eyes, as reproachful and derogatory to the manners of their native Country. So Antipater

took the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to join with Ptolemy. Craterus used great celerity, to have taken Eumenes revelling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captains, after a great Victory. But he had a wary and well-advised enemy to encounter, who kept good espial upon him, and with much wisdom fore-saw all that was to be feared, and the means of prevention, which his courage did not fail to execute. Eumenes was not ignorant that Craterus was able to defeat him without Battle, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Army following him was such, as much exceeded his own footmen, but was inferior in horse-men) and thought it more unsafe to keep the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Herupon he took in hand a strange piece of work, which desperation of all courses else taught him, and wise managing prosperously accomplished. He gave out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such company as he could gather together, and had gotten Pigres (a Captain of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to join with him. Having animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be despised and hated among them, (as having been vanquished by some of them, and forsaken others in plain field, whilst they valiantly fought in his quarrel) he took great care to keep them from receiving any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded that no messenger nor trumpeter should be admitted; and not here-with satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would have regarded him, had he been known: but Thracians, Cappadocians, and Persians, under the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas and himself. To these also he gave in charge, that without speaking or hearkning to any word, they should run upon the enemy; and gave him no leisure to say, or do any thing but fight. The directions which he gave to others, he did not fail to execute in his own person: for placing himself in the right wing of his Battle, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as he understood) conducted the left wing on the contrary side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and ready to charge the enemy as soon as the distance would give leave. A rising piece of ground lay between them, which having ascended, the Armies discovered each other: but that of Eumenes every way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long journeys, which over-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitful issue of frivolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (having failed in surprizing them as enemies) to discover himself to his old friends, and fellow-souldiers, of whom he could see none: Phælix a Tenidian, and Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who, mindful of their instructions began to give battle upon him, with such countenance as told him his error; which to redeem, he bade his men fight, and redeem the day, and take the spoil to themselves; but the Bear, whose skin he sells, is not yet caught. The ground whereon the Battle was fought, gave most advantage to the horse, who encountered very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus; who, as soon as they had discovered one another, could not contain themselves, but with great rage met body to body, and letting loose their bridles, grappled, so violently together, that their horses ran from under them, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first up, but Eumenes had his sword first drawn, wherewith he houghed the other, causing him to fall down and fight upon one knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Neoptolemus giving slight ones, took such as were deadly, by which he died in the place, and was there (being half-dead, half-alive) stripped by his mortal enemy, whose revilings he required, lying even at the last gasp, with one wound in the groin, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to run away upon the spur, and seek shelter behind the Battels of their Foot. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himself to carry succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly born himself a while, and sustained the impression of Artabazus and Phælix with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little estimation or note. Otherwise it is not unlikely that he might have either carried the day, or preserved himself to a better adventure by giving ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were slain) did. But whilst he fought to preserve his reputation, he lost his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound received; upon which accident he was trampled under foot by many that knew him not, and so perished unknown, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes coming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as having always loved and honoured Craterus, of whose death he was now become the instrument. The vanquished Army entertained a treaty of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingness to become his followers; but their intent was only to refresh themselves, which (by his permission) having done, they stole away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This Battle fought within ten dayes of the former, was to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his own Souldiers took the death of Craterus heavily; and the Armies lying further off were enraged with the news. But other matters there were which incensed men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifestly appeared, that he was as sorry as any that pretended greater heaviness. His Army wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wisely amended, by giving to them the spoil of such Towns as were ill-affected to him. So he redeemed the love of his own men, who of their meer motion appointed unto him a Guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easy to be reconciled. They who had been Traitors to Perdiccas, hated him for his faithfulness, as greatly, as they thought he would hate them for their faithlessness; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late revolt, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and condemned him to dye: but it was an easier matter to give that sentence, than to put it in execution.

S. X.

Quarrels between Eurydice the Queen, and Python the Protector. Python resigns his Office, into which Antipater is chosen.

Python and Aridaus being chosen Protectors of King Aridaus, and the children of Alexander; took the way to Assula the less, conducting the Army thorow Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet far too weak to sustain so important a Charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Aridaus, was come to her husband, a Lady of a masculine spirit, well understanding what she was or should be, and thinking her self able to support the weight which fortune laid upon her foolish husband, being due to her own title. Her mother Cyna, Sister to Alexander, by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath been shewed) to Amyntas, who was the right Heir to the

This Cyna was a warlike woman; she had led Armies, and (as a true Sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Cerix Queen of the Phrygians; a Virago, like unto her self, had slain her. She brought up this Eurydice in the same unwomanly Art of War, who now among the Souldiers began to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brook her too curious intermeddling in his charge. Whether it were so, that Python had some purpose to advance the Son of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdom, (as once he had sought to do;) or whether the Queen did suspect him of some such intent; or whether only desire of rule caused her to quarrel with him; quarrel she did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Army having shaken off such a rank-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reined with a twined thread. Python bearing himself upon his office, took upon him to give directions in the Kings name, which the Queen did oftentimes controul, using the same name with more authority, and better liking of the Souldiers. Python seeing this, would needs resign his office, whether upon weariness of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queen into envy, it is uncertain. Perhaps he thought, that now being the far worst man in the Camp, he should be intreated to retain the place, and have his authority confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successor. Eurydice was nothing sorry at this course; for now she thought to manage the affairs of the Empire at her own will, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python of their contrary expectations; choosing Antipater, the only powerful man of Alexanders Captains, then living, into the room of Python. Hereat the Queen fretted exceedingly, and began to deal earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord (save only the King their Sovereign. Yet she failed of her purpose, being hindered (as may seem) by three things: the apparent weakness of her husband; the growth of Alexanders children, who (though born of outlandish women) were bred in the Macedonian Camp; and the nightiness of Antipater, who commanding a great Army near at hand, arrived in few dayes at the Camp, and enforced Eurydice to hold her self content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to work by any close devices, as Perdiccas diccas had done : he had no concurrents, all the Governours of Provinces that remained alive, acknowledged him their better ; yea many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their rooms. This done, he took the King, Queen, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonus General of the Royal Army : to whom for his good services done, and to be done against Eumenes, he gave the rule of Sufana, besides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the Government of Asia during that War.

§. XI.

Antigonus Lieutenant of Asia, wins a Battel of Eumenes, and begetteth him in Nora : He vanquisheth other followers of Perdiccas.

HERE begins the greatness of Antigonus, whose power in few years over-growing the rest, wanted little of spreading it self over the whole Monarchy. He was to make War upon Eumenes, Alcetus, the Brother, and Attalus the Brother-in-law to Perdiccas : work enough to keep his Army employed in the publick service, till such time as he might find occasion to make use of it in his own business. The first of these which he undertook, was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refused to joyn, having unreasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needful provisions ; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all ways of corrupting his Souldiers ; tempting first the whole Army with letters : which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if he himself had scattered abroad those Letters to try the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captains as he thought most easie to be won. Of these Captains one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any help was near him, yet looking so carelessly to himself, that he and his were surpris'd, when he thought his enemies far off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his treachery secret, reserving it for the time of execution. Upon confidence of the treason which this false man, Apollonides, had undertaken, Antigonus presented battel to Eumenes ; in the heat whereof Apollonides, General of the Horse to Eumenes, fled over to the contrary side, with such as he could get to follow him : but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes perceiving the irrecoverable mischief which this traitorous practice had brought upon him, pursued the villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himself into the troops of Antigonus, and boast of his treachery. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the loss of that Battel, which disabled him utterly to keep the field, and left it very hard for him to make a safe retreat. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himself to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the Victory, to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilst Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compass, returned to the place where the Battel had been fought ; there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interr'd the bones and ashes of the Captains and common Souldiers apart, raising up heaps of earth as mountains over them, and so went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians (returned to their Camp) great admiration of his brave spirit : so the news which Menander (who was set to look unto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to love him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plain, careless, as after an assured Victory, and laden with the spoils of many Nations, the rewards of their long service ; all which he might have taken : but fearing lest such a purchase should prove a heavy burden to him, whose chief hope consisted in swift expedition, he gave secret warning to Menander to fly to the mountains, whilst he detained his men (whom authority could not have restrained) by this sleight, setting them to bait their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtship, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborn when it lay in his power to strip them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaves, and to ravish their wives : but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborn to do this out of any good will to them ; but out of meer subtilty had avoided those precious fetters, which would have hindered his speedy flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not only think all carriages to be over-burdenfome, but the number of his men to be more troublefome than available in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to shift for themselves ; and retaining only five hundred horse, and two hundred foot. When he had wearied Antigonus

a while in following him up and down, he came to Nora, where again keeping no more about him than necessity required to make good the place, he lovingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little fortress in the borders of Lycania and Cappadocia, so strongly situated, that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualled and stored with all necessaries, that it might hold out for many years. Thither did Antigonus follow him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in War. To this purpose he entertained parley with him, but in vain. For, whereas Antigonus offered him pardon and his love ; Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed up ; where Antigonus leaving sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, took his journey into Pisidia against Alcetus and Attalus, with whom he made short work. He came upon them unexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captain as Eumenes, to have defended them. Alcetus and Attalus, as they had been too secure before his coming, so were they too adventurous, in fighting at the first sight, upon all disadvantages : and their folly was attended with suitable event. Attalus, with many principal Captains was taken ; Alcetus fled to the City of Termessus, where the love of the younger fort toward him was so vehement, that stopping their ears against all persuasions of the ancient men, they needs would hazard their lives, and their Country in his defence. Yet this availed him nothing : for the Governours of the Town having secretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the young men to fall out ; and using the time of advantage, they with their servants did set upon Alcetus, who unable to resist, slew himself. His dead body was conveyed to Antigonus, and by him barbarously torn, was cast forth without burial. When Antigonus was gone, the young men interr'd the carcases with solemn Funerals, having once been minded to set on fire their own Town in revenge of his death. Such favour had he purchased with courteous liberality. But, to make an able General, one virtue, how great soever, is insufficient.

Protolmy wins Syria and Phoenicia. The death of Antipater.

WHILEST these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enjoy their Governments for the present, than to confirm or enlarge them. Only Protolmy looking abroad, was all Syria and Phenicia : an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumstance in the managing. He sent a Lieutenant with an Army, who quickly took Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas ; but (as may seem) without any great strength of Souldiers, far from Assitants, and vainly relying upon the Authority which had given him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintain him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. He had with him Polyperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captains, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Etolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrel of Perdiccas, prevailing far at the first, but soon losing all that they had gained, whilst Antipater was abroad in his Cilician Expedition. In this Polyperchon, Antipater did repose great confidence ; so far forth, that (suspecting the youth of his own Son Cassander of insufficiency in so great a charge) he bequeathed unto him on his death-bed the Government of Macedon and Greece, together with his office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being fourscore years old, having always travelled in the great affairs of mighty Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatness was jealous of him, and the successors of Alexander did either quietly give place unto him ; or were unfortunate in making oppositions. In his private qualities, he was a subtle man, temperate, frugal, and of a Philosophical behaviour, not unlearned, as having been Scholar to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had been much molested by Olympias, Alexanders Mother ; whom after the death of her Son, he compelled to abstain from coming into Macedonia, or intermeddling in matters of State : yea, at his own death he gave especial direction, that no woman should be permitted to deal in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soon forgotten ; and yet, ere long, by sorrowfull experience approved to have been found and good.

§. XIII.

§. XIII.

Of Polyſperchon, who ſucceeded unto Antipater in the Proteſtorſhip. The inſurrection of Caſſander againſt him.

Polyſperchon was very ſkilfull in the Art of War, having long time been Apprentice in that occupation; other qualities, requiſite in fo high an Office as he underwent, either Nature had not given to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his buſineſs more formally than wiſely, as a man of a ſecond wit, fitter to aſſiſt, than command in chief. At the firſt entrance upon the ſtage, he called to counſel all his friends, wherein for weighty conſiderations (as they who weighed not the contrary reaſons held them) the Queen Olympias was revoked out of Epirus into Macedon, that the preſence of Alexanders mother might countenance and ſtrengthen their proceedings. For, the condition of the times requiring, that the Governours of Provinces abroad ſhould keep greater Armies, than were needful or eaſie to be retained about the perſon of the King in Macedonia; it ſeemed expedient, that the face of the Court ſhould be filled with all Maſtety, that might give authority to the Injunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awful regard contain within the limited bounds of duty ſuch aſcoud not by force have been kept in order, being ſtrong, and lying too far off.

Such care was taken for prevention of imaginary dangers and out of ſight, whileſt preſent miſchiefs lay unregarded in their boſoms. Caſſander, the Son of Antipater, was not able to diſcover that great ſufficiency in Polyſperchon, for which his father had reposed in him ſo much confidence: neither could he diſcern ſuch odds in the quality of himſelf and Polyſperchon, as was in their fortune. He was left Captain of one thouſand; which Office by practice of thoſe times was of more importance, than the title now ſeems to imply. He ſhould thereby have been as Camp-maſter, or Lieutenant general to the other: a place no way ſatisfying his ambition, that thought himſelf the better man. Therefore he began to examine his own power, and compare it with the forces likely to oppoſe him. All that had relied on his Father, were his own aſſured, eſpecially ſuch as commanded the Garrifons beſtowed in the principal Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magiſtrates, and others of principal authority, in thoſe Common-weals, whoſe forms had been corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the ſide, and draw in many partakers: it concerned theſe men in their own particular to adhere unto the Captains, by whom their faction was up-held; and by whom the raſcal multitude, covetous of re-gaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exerciſed over the principal Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Beſides all theſe helps, Caſſander had the ſecret love of Queen Eurydice, who had in private rendered him ſuch courteſie, as was due only to her husband. But neither the Queens favour, nor all his other poſſibilities, gave him confidence to break out into open rebellion; becauſe he ſaw Polyſperchon much revered among the Macedonians, and ſtrong enough to ſuppreſs him, before he could have made head. Therefore he made ſhew of following his pleaſures in the Country, and calling many of his friends about him, under pretence of hunting, adviſed with them upon the ſafeſt courſe, and moſt free from all ſuſpicion. The neceſſity was apparent of raiſing an Army, before the buſineſs was ſet on foot; and to do this, opportunity preſented him with fair means. Ptolomy had by ſine force, without any commiſſion, annexed Syria to his Government of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to truſt him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus upon the firſt news of Antipaters death, began to lay hold upon all that he could get, in ſuch fort, that he manifeſtly diſcovered his intent of making himſelf Lord of all Aſia. Theſe two therefore ſtood in need of a Civil War; which Caſſander well noted, and preſumed withall, That the friendſhip which had paſſed between his Father and them, would avail him ſomewhat. Whereupon he ſecretly diſpatched meſſengers to them both; and within a little while conveyed himſelf on a ſudden over the Hellespont, that he might in perſon advance the buſineſs with greater ſpeed. Much perſwaſion is needleſs in winning a man to what he deſireth. Antigonus coveting nothing more, than to find Polyſperchon weak, by raiſing ſome commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities muſt not be neglected) Caſſander did very earneſtly preiſs him, by the memory of his Father, and all requiſite conjurations, to aſſiſt him in this enterpriſe; telling him, that Ptolomy was ready to declare for them, and urging him to a ſpeedy diſpatch. Antigonus on the other ſide repayed him with the ſame coin, ſaying, That for his own ſake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearly loved, he would not fail to give him all manner manner of ſuccour. Having thus ſeaſted one another with words, they were nothing ſlack in preparing the common means, leading to their ſeveral ends.

§. XIV.

The unworthy courſes held by Polyſperchon, for the keeping down of Caſſander.

Great neceſſity there was of timely proviſion. For, Polyſperchon needed no other inſtructions to inform him of Caſſanders drift, than the news of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready diſpoſition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomy, to the ſtrengthening of rebellion; and well he knew that one principal hope of Caſſander was reposed in the confidence of ſuch as ruled in the Grecian Eaſtate. Therefore (loving to work circumſpectly) he called another Council, wherein it was concluded, That the popular form of Government ſhould be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrifons withdrawn; and that all Magiſtrates and principal Men, into whoſe hands Antipater had committed the ſupreme Authority, ſhould forthwith be either ſlain or baniſhed. This was a ſure way to diminiſh the number of Caſſanders friends, and to raiſe up many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was diſcloſed both an unthankful nature in Polyſperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For, how could he be excuſed of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Son went about to diſhonour the Fathers actions, whoſe only bounty had enabled him to do it? Or what could be ſaid in their defence, who ſought to deſtroy many worthy men, friends to the State, by whom the Greeks were held reſtrained from ſtirring againſt the Macedonians; and in oppoſition to their private enemy, gave the rule of things to baſe Companions, and ſuch as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans body, through ſinews newly iſſuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next neighbour, than by any diſtemper in the contrary hand: ſo in bodies pollick, the humours of men ſubdivided in faction, are more enraged by the diſagreeable qualities of ſuch as curb them in their neareſt purpoſes, than they are exasperated by the general oppoſition of ſuch as are divided from them in the main trunk. Hereby it comes to paſs, that contrary Religions are invited to help againſt Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawn in, to a part in civil Wars, and ancient hatred called to counſel againſt injurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guilty; the hath taught the arm to offer it ſelf unto manifold loſs in defence of the head: They are depraved affections, which render men ſenſible of their own particular, and forgetfull of the more general good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greeks were preſented with a vain ſhew of liberty, ran under the Kings name; but ſo, as one might eaſily diſcern, that Polyſperchon had guided his pen. For the main point was, That they ſhould follow ſuch directions, as Polyſperchon gave, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the reſt it contained ſuch a deal of kindneſs as proceeding on a ſudden from thoſe who had kept them in hard ſubjection, might well appear to have ſome other root than the pretended good will; and was of it ſelf too baſe and unfit for a King to uſe toward his conquered Subjects, and often ſubdued Rebels.

§. XV.

Of the great Commotions raiſed in Athens by Polyſperchons decree. The death of Phocion.

Nevertheleſs the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happy ſeeming Proclamation, and fought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captain of the Garrifon, which kept one of their Havens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Town, would needs take longer time of deliberation, than was pleaſing to their haſty deſires.

Nicanor, as a truſty follower of Caſſander, was by him ſhifted into the place, and Metellus (that was Captain there before) diſcharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His coming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who ſoon after hearing the news of Antipater's death, cried out upon Phocion, ſaying, That he had ſufficient intelligence of that accident, and might, by advertiſing them in due time, have put into their hands a fair opportunity of thruſting out the Macedonians. But theſe exclamations argued no more than a deſire to ſhake off the Macedonian yoke. Far more grievouſly would they have been offended, had they known the inſtructions which Caſſander had given to Nicanor, and his reſolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he ſhould not only retain Munychia, any injunction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that he ſhould find means to thruſt ſome companies companies into Pireus, and fortifie that also, which was the principal Haven, against the high Town. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good ability. But the Athenians were not long in giving him sufficient cause to do that, which he would have done without any cause given. They desired him to come unto their Council, assembled in the Pireus, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation: whither upon Phocion's word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the War which was ready to break forth. Contrariwise, they urged him first of all, to make them masters of their own, which how to use, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to descend unto the others demand; the Athenians (who did always measure justice by profit, yet seldom thrived by that course) practised with Dercillus, a Captain following Polyperchon, and then lying near at hand, that he should enter into the Town, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion, who then governed in Athen, a man very unlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politick dishonesty, did quietly suffer him to depart and save himself.

Nicanor hereupon began to devise upon taking Pireus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his own just revenge. He levied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Pireus, took it, and intrenched himself therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Haven, saw him now master of both. Alexander, the son of Polyperchon, came thither shortly after with an Army. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recovering all, and addressed themselves unto him; who made fair shews, intending meer mischief, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vain Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queen. Olympias, taking upon her to command, before the durst well adventure to return into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which he held: but he would first consider more of the matter. Polyperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should be rendred unto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeed) so far from purposing to let them have Samos, that as yet he did not thoroughly intend to let them have themselves. The commodity of their Havens was such, as he would rather get in to his own hands, than leave in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassander's. His son Alexander, not ignorant of this, made fair shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labour, to intermeddle with the business. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the displeasure they conceived against him, they poured out upon Phocion, depriving him of his office. This was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundry passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought every one that best could inveigh against things past, a most likely man to finde some remedy for the evil threatening them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander devising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, and held much privy conference with him; which he could not so secretly carry, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the uproar in the Town was so far increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driven to seek safeguard of their lives by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gave them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polyperchon was in the Country of Phocis, ready to enter with an Army into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their own deserts (having always been friends to the Macedonians, as far as the good of their Country gave leave) should be enough to get patronage to their innocency. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polyperchon's familiar friend, went along with them (in an evil hour) who promised to himself and them great favour, by means of his acquaintance. But Polyperchon was an unflinching man, very earnest in what he took in hand, yet either for want of judgement in following them, or of honesty in holding the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halves, which made him commonly fail of good success. For fear of Cassander he had offered wonderful kindness to the Athenians; this had caused them to love him: out of their love he gathered hope of deceiving them, which made him to change his mind, and seek how to get into his own hands those keys, with which Cassander held them fast lockt up: finding himself disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, he stood wavering between the contrary allurements of profit and reputation. To keep the Athenians perforce at his devotion, would indeed have done well: but the effecting of this began to grow desperate; and many Towns of importance in Greece, began to cast their eyes upon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore he thought it the wisest way to redeem their good opinion, by giving all contentment unto the popular faction, which was then grown to be Master of that City. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian Embassadors come, treading (as one may say) upon Phocion's heels, whom they were sent to accuse. These had solemn audience given to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was glorified with all exterior shews of Majestie; yet all too little to change Aridens into Alexander: for he did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he saw others do. For beginning of the business, Polyperchon commanded that Dinarchus should be tortured and slain. This was enough to testifie his hearty affection to the Commonalty of Athen, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake; whose Embassadors he then bade to speak. When their errand was done, and answer to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the rest were pronounced guilty of Treason; but to give sentence, and do the execution upon them, was (for honors sake) referred unto the City of Athen, because they were Burgeses. Then were they sent away to Athen, where the rascal multitude, not suffering them to speak for themselves, condemned them to dye. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion being very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to be of the less regard. Five and forty times had he been chosen Governor of the City, never suing for the place, but sent for when he was absent, so well was his integrity known, and so highly valued, even of such as were no pretenders to the same virtue. He was a good Commander in War, wherein, though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and never unfortunate. Never did the City repent of having followed his counsel: nor any private man of having trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signs of his love) sent him two hundred talents of silver, and offered to bestow upon him of four Cities in Asia, any one which he would chuse. But Phocion refused these and other gifts, howsoever importunately thrust upon him; resting well contented with his honest poverty: wherein he lived about fourscore years, and then was compelled by the unjust judgement of wicked men, to drink that poison, which by just judgement of the righteous God, is infected the City of Athen, as from that day forwards it never brought forth any worthy man resembling the virtue of their Ancestors.

§. XVI.

Of Polyperchon his vain Expedition against Cassander.

Not long after these things were done, Cassander, with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entered into Pireus; which news drew Polyperchon headlong into Attica, with a great Army, but so ill victualled, that he was fain to depart without any thing done. Only he had given some impediment to the enemy; who, not contented with defending what he held, began to look out, and made new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himself funable to drive Cassander out of Athen, he left his son Alexander, with such number of men as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further incroaching. The greatest part of his Army he carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Country sure to himself, wherein Cassander had many friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had been in other parts of Greece. First, he began to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democracy, or popular form of Government. He commanded that the principal Citizens, that had by Antipater been made Rulers, should be either slain, or driven into exile. This Decree took immediate effect in most places: the vulgar sort being very ready to seal the Charter of their freedom and authority, with the blood of those who had kept them in subjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chief Citizens; and many which withed well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polyperchon meant to inflict an exemplary punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteen thousand serviceable men, well furnished of necessaries, and resolved to endure the worst. And need there was of such resolution. For Polyperchon coming thither with all his power, did so much, that he overthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall between them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came up to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised up an inner wall, to bear out the next assault. The Assailants having failed to carry the Town at the first attempt, took much pains to clear the ground, and make fair way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to overthrow all that came in their way. But the Townsmen perceiving their drift, prepared boards driven thorow with long nails, which they used as gall-thorns, bestowing them slightly covered, with the points upward, in the way by which the beasts were to pass. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certain light-armed men to beat upon their sides with Arrows and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Wars. Of these provisions they made happy use in the next assault. For, by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemy chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driven back upon the Macedonians, whom they trampled under feet. Polyperchon came as ill furnished for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the business quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, he forsook the siege, with some loss, and much dishonour, leaving some part of his Army to lie before the Town for his credit.

After this he sent Clitus, his Admiral, to Sea, to joyn with Arideus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole fleet under Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the overthrow, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor again, assuring him of the Victory, as well he might. For he sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom he caused to be waited over the Streights in small Vessels by night; these before day-light setting upon Clitus, drove his men, that lay securely on the Land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriving, did assail them so lustily, that few or none escaped them.

This loss at Sea, together with his bad success by Land, brought Polyperchon into great contempt. He had a good faculty in penning bloody Decrees; but when the execution was referred to his own sword, he could find the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiving that he had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to give them protection against the enemy which lay in their bosoms, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a Governor of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the party of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly revolted unto him, as to an industrious man, and likely to prevail in the end. Thus was the whole Country set in a combustion, unable to be quenched; which presented unto Antigonus an opportunity, that he neglected not, of making himself Lord of Asia.

§. XVII.

Antigonus seeks to make himself an absolute Lord: and thereupon treats with Eumenes, who disappoints him. Phrygia and Lydia won by Antigonus.

Antigonus had in Antipater's life-time a firm resolution, to make unto himself the utmost benefit that he might of the Army committed to his charge. And in fair season for advancement of his purposes came the news of Antipater's death; even then, when all the business in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more employment for the Army remaining, save only the continuance of the siege of Nora, a small thing of it self, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutability, to which the present Estate was manifestly subject, would in continuance of some years (which he might abide) work more for him, than his enemies in that space could for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men and horses might grow sickly and unserviceable: which made him to practise many devices of keeping them in health and lusty. But when he had continued shut up in this manner about a year, his hopes came to good pass, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himself, whose forces held him besieged.

Antigonus knowing the great sufficiency of Eumenes, and considering his fidelity shewed unto Perdiccas, thought that he could not find in all the world a fitter man than him, to employ in managing those high designs wherein he doubted not that he should be withstood by the mightiest Princes of the

the Empire. He sent therefore to Eumenes, by one that was friendly to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a better Lord than ever he had been, and the next man to himself, if things fell out as he desired: in regard whereof he required only his friendship, and thereupon lent him an oath to take; which done, he might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and enjoy his perfect liberty. Eumenes perusing the form of the oath, did perceive the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the blood, rather to keep the Decorum, than upon any loyal intent, the binding words and sum of all were such, as tied him fast only to Antigonus, omitting all reservation of duty, to the King or any other. This he liked not, holding it unbecomely to become a sworn man to him, with whom he had fought for the mastery; and being assured that his voluntary assistance, which way soever he gave it, would be more acceptable, and far more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would he not therefore break off the negotiation, and wait for some better occasion of enlargement, which might perhaps be long in coming: but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to give up his Hold and depart. As for the oath it self, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemn enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifying in their allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked his words, and gave him leave to put in Olympia, and the children of Alexander, binding himself to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken upon him, as soon as he came down to the Sea-side, to remove some of the Governors of the Provinces, behaving himself according to the authority which he had received of Antipater, to exercise in the time of War. Neither did he want sufficient pretence whereby to justify his proceeding. For, if Polyperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man doing on his death-bed bequeathed unto him, as a Legacy, without consent of the Princes and Soldiers; why might not he himself as well retain the Lieutenantship of Asia, that was granted unto him for the general good of the State, in presence of the whole Army, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordain what should seem convenient whilst he lived, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To give a fair colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had three score thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thirty Elephants in a readiness to answer them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Arideus, Governor of Phrygia; who fortified the Towns of his own Province, and sought to have won Cicium, a fair Haven Town, and seated very conveniently for him, but was fain to go away without it. Hereupon Antigonus took occasion to command him out of the Country. Arideus was so far from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieve Eumenes. Nevertheless finding that he was unable of himself to make long resistance, he took such companies as he could draw along with him, and so passed over into Europe, to complain at the Court. The like fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished; and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

§. XVIII.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes. Eumenes having authority from the Court, raiseth great war against Antigonus in defence of the Royal house.

Antigonus having thus gotten into his hands all, or most of all Asia the less, was able to have entered Macedon and seized upon the Court; which that he forbore to do, it proceeded (as may seem) from some of these reasons. It would have bred as much jealousy in Cassander, as fear in Polyperchon, which might have brought them to terms of reconciliation: It would ask more time than he could spare; and the envy which followed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make war upon him in defence of the Royal house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well-affected. Against him therefore he bent his course, and with an Army of twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, made great haste towards Cicium, hoping to suppress him before he should be able to make head.

Emmenes was one of those few that continued faithful to their dead Master, which being well known in the Court, he had commission sent unto him from thence to raise an Army, and make war upon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as he should need. Other letters also there were directed to all the Governors of Provinces, requiring them to give assistance to Emmenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captains of the old Souldiers, called the Argyraphides, or Silver-shielded bands, commandment was given to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, before this Authority was given him: but now he purposed with all the strength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royal blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring help to her, and her Nephew the Son of Alexander; and in the mean time to give her his advice in that which Polyperchon required of her: for she was desirous to return into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawful bounds. Emmenes therefore counselled her to remain in Epirus, till such time as he could bring the war to a good issue; which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the feed of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire, scarce any one could be found among the Noblemen, in whom Alexander's Mother, Wives and Children, might repose firm confidence, saving only this Emmenes, a stranger to the Macedonian blood, born at Cardia, a City of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his own virtue had made it; his followers obeyed at their own discretion; and compelled he was to travel as far as Persia, to gather together an Army sufficient to resist the enemies that pursued his heels.

§. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Aridaeus and Eurydice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

Now, forasmuch as in this present War all the Rulers of the Provinces did intermeddle; and great alterations happened, not only in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it self, which brought a new face unto the State, by the extirpation of the Royal house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it convenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the War it self, to shew briefly how the great Ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawn into those courses, which overthrew most of them, and out of their ruins built the greatness of a few: as like-wise to what extremity the faction brake out in Macedon it self, about the main Controversie of the Title to the Crown, whereupon all other quarrels were or should have been depending.

Aridaus the King, being simple and fearful, did only what he was bidden.

Polyperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to advance the Son of Alexander by Roxane to the Kingdom, and become Governor to a King of his own making.

Eurydice the Queen discovering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing less than to let her husband serve as a Stale, keeping the Throne warm till another were grown old enough to fit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turn.

Cassander held fresh in mind the danger wherein his family had been through Alexander's malice, together with the indignity offered to himself by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof, and the pleasure which he took in the amorous Queen, made him to resolve, both to suppress the lineage which he hated, and to maintain his beloved Mistress, either by supporting her weak Husband, or by taking her to be his own Wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent, who reigned over all, so as they might reign in their several Countries, and establish their authority in such wife; that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Pholomy and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

Pitho and Seleucus lying far off, and being strong, had some good hope to inroach upon their neighbours. Against these, Pencestes, and some others, with much ado hardly made resistance, until such time as Emmenes came to them; who propounded to himself great matters, which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queen (as it is common with step-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wives. It was thought that she had given poyson to Aridaus, which failing to take away his life, had much paired

paired both his body and wits. Now she considering, that Emmenes was too full of business to come home so soon as she wished that he should; and that Cassander daily prevailed in Greece: thought it the best way to joya with Polyperchon, and set up, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the Son of Roxane, removing Aridaus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so took her way towards Polyperchon, who joyning with her, entered into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these news, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other business, and come to succour her. She her self by entreaty, gifts, and promises, drew to her party as many of the Macedonians as she could, until she thought her own side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traytor Polyperchon.

These two Queens met armed, as if the matter should have been determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the revolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soon as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious reign of her Husband and Son, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her self thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted, and made prisoner with her Husband.

Olympias having obtained this Victory without blood, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and upon the same considerations for which they had refused to bear Arms against her, the Macedonians would not stick to maintain her, whatsoever her proceedings were. Having therefore shut up Aridaus and his wife in a close room, where they could scarce turn round, she fed them thorow a little hole, till after a while it came in her head (for fear lest the people should have commiseration of him, that had reigned almost six years and a half) to put them to death. So she delivered Aridaus to some barbarous Thracians, who took away his life by cruel torments: to Eurydice she sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poyson, willing her to chuse the instrument of her own death, who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yielded her neck to the halter, having pent her last curses not in vain. Nicanor the Brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chief of his friends, did Olympias then chuse out, all whom she commanded to be slain. His Brother Tolans that was already dead and buried, she accused of poyson given to Alexander, and thereupon caused his Tomb to be thrown down, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this fury, began to condemn themselves, and the folly of Polyperchon, who had, quite contrary to Antipaters charge given on his death-bed, called this outrageous woman to the Government of the Empire.

§. XX.

How Cassander was revenged upon Olympias

i. i.

The great Expedition of Cassander. Olympias shuts her self into Pydna, where Cassander besieged her. Bacides King of Epirus, coming to succour Olympias, is forsaken and banished by his own Subjects.

Cassander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnesus; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he never stayed to take the City, nor to give order for the state of things in that Country, (though Alexander the Son of Polyperchon, were there with an Army) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his associates to look to themselves as well as they could, till his return; and so in all haste he took his journey towards Macedon, carried headlong with the greedy desire of just revenge. The Aetolians had taken the Streights of Thermopylae, in favour of the Queen and Polyperchon, to hinder his passage; but he, not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many ships as he could, great and small, with which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he divided his companies, appointing some under Callos, a subtil Captain, to hold Polyperchon busied, who then lay incamped near to Perthabis, with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. She, having once prevailed by the respect given to her dignity took more care how to appear Majestical, than to make her self strong. To this end she made a solemn progress to Pydna, a Sea-Town, and well fenced, having in her company all the flower of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her young Son Alexander, heir to the great Alexander, by his Grand-mothers designation: who during his minority, kept his Sovereign power in her own hands. But all this pomp served to little use against the violence of the enemy, that soon presented himself before the walls; only it fed the besieged with a vain hope of succour, that would from all parts arrive, to rescue persons of their quality. And hereof there soon appeared fair likelihood, which as soon vanished, and went away in smoke.

For Lucius King of Epirus made great haste to bring succour to Olympias his Cousin, with whom Deodamia his daughter was also shut up. Nevertheless, his Subjects were nothing forward in this Expedition; but finding certain passages taken in the way by Cassanders men, they called upon him to retire, and quit the enterprize. The Kings importunity urging them to proceed, and the obstinate refusal of the Army, brake out at length into such terms, that when he had raged in vain against the multitude, his authority, with which he thought to have prevailed upon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forsake his Kingdom, and to wander up and down in foreign Countries a banished man, his people joining with the enemy, against whom he had led them forth to war.

Ptydia in the mean time was closed up strictly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could issue out of the City, nor any relief be conveyed into it, but it held out as long as any food was left; no memorable service being done there, whilst great actions were managed abroad.

§. II.

A continuation of Olympias her story. Polybetion defeated. Extreme Famine in Ptdia. Olympias yields to Cassander.

NOW, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of Eumenes and Antigonus in this place, leaving Olympias yet a while to the hour of her destiny, which grows the faster upon her, because the may discern it coming: yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, by inserting her Tragedy in the midst of things not manifestly coherent with it; we will here (as elsewhere we have done, and elsewhere must) continue to an end one History; that we may not be therewith distracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polybetion, was in like manner disappointed as their former trust had been, which was reposed in the succour of the Epirians. For Calixtus, who was sent against him, found the means to corrupt the greatest part of his Army with money, leaving him within a little while to slenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other business of war, than a swift retreat. When famine had so far prevailed in the City, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead carcases of their fellows; and sawdust being given to the Elephants for provender; some of the Soldiers obtaining the Queens leave (who could not deny it) others, without asking leave, yielded themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and sent abroad into the Country. The news of the Queens affairs, dispersed by these men, did to affright her well-willers, that such as had reserved themselves to the event, came in apace, and submitted to Cassander. At length, when the mortality was so great in the Town, that the living were even poisoned with the noisome sent of the dead; Olympias bethought her self of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that she had: wherewith her success was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Town, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be unto her as a house of torment, and a Gaol, out of which she should not be delivered, but unto an evil death. Being therefore utterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, unaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition, and with much labour hardly obtained of Cassander (who having fetched her Gally out of the Haven, accounted himself as good as master of her body) a grant of her own life. Immediately upon her apprehension, Pella, the chief City of the Kingdom, was yielded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Aristonius (to whom Olympias had given charge of such Forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the success of some petty services whereto he had prevailed) began to promise himself great unlikelyhoods. But Olympias, to win Cassander's favour, very earnestly required him upon his faith to her, that he should give it up. He did so, and presently after was killed by his private enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him upon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seek Innovation.

§. III.

The death of Olympias, and her conditions.

WHEN Olympias had now heard sorrowful tidings of all her friends, the her self was called into question, and accused in an Assembly of the Macedonians, for the murders (they were so titled in her affliction, which which in time of prosperity she called justice) by her committed. There was the (being not heard, nor called to speak) condemned to die. The sute was commenced and prosecuted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slain. But it was at Cassander's instigation, who (to hasten the execution) sent her word, that he would furnish her with a ship, and other necessities, to save her self by flight: which when she refused, saying, that she would plead for her self, and tell her own tale; he dissembled no longer, but sent unto her such men, as hated her most, who took away her miserable life. She was Daughter, and Sister, unto two Kings of Epirus; Wife and Mother unto two the mightiest Kings, of that, or many other ages; a stout Lady, and of unreprieveable chastity; but her ambition was boundless, her hatred unappeasable, and her fury in revenge most unwomanly. Her perverse conditions made her Husband seek other Wives and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and them. She was thought privy to her Husbands death; after which, very cruelly she slew his late Wife Cleopatra, having first murdered one of her two children in her arms, and with a beastly fury broiled the other alive in fire, in a Copper-bason. For these things, her Son Alexander (otherwise loving her well) forbade her to meddle in the Government of Macedon. But God, more severe unto cruel Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wills, permitted her to live and fulfil the rest of her wickedness (which was his justice upon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others;) after all which, he rewarded her malice, by returning it upon her own head.

§. IV.

Cassander celebrates the Funeral of Aridæus and Eurydice; and seeks to make himself King of Macedon.

AFTER her death, Cassander gave honorable burial to Aridæus and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatness, he married the Lady Theophylacta, whom he had taken at Ptydia, being the Daughter of King Philip, by another of his Wives; that by her he might have some title to the Crown. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her young Son to close Prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to encrease his fame, and purchase love, built a City, called by his own name Cassandria, that soon grew to be very great and powerful. He re-edified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it unto the old Inhabitants, after it had lain twenty years waste, being utterly razed by Alexander. By these means, especially by the restoration of Thebes, wherunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies unto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leaving him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will return to them, who contended in Asia, for less titles, but larger Provinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IV.

Of the great Lordship which Antigonus got in Asia.

§. I.

The Journey of Eumenes into Persia. His wife dealing with those that joyed with him.

EUMENES, having joyned unto his company the Agrepsides, made But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was too great, his Army possession of those Countries, according to his Commission, and strengthen himself against Antigonus. He took his journey through Calycedonia and Phenicia, hoping to reclaim those Provinces, usurped the rest of Syria (as hath been showed) by Pholomy, to the Kings obedience. The Captains of the Agrepsides were so froward, froward, that they scorned to repair to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so unsteady, that they might more easily have dealt with open Traytors. It was not expedient, that he, being General, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keep them in order by compulsion. Therefore he feigned, that Alexander had appointed unto him, in a dream, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich pavilion, wherein an empty throne was placed, as if Alexander himself had been present at their consultations. Thus he freed himself from their vain pride; but of their faith he could have no assurance. Yet when Pytho requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued, though not without considering of the matter, to take his part. So he marched on, sending before him the Kings Warrant; which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as rejecting the Kings Authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Army, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well, that he was not to rely upon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected than his affairs required, and were not to be dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand through the Country of Babylonia, in such wise that Seleucus, having in vain assayed to hinder him, by opening the sluices of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Peneftes and the rest of the Eastern Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences between Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority grew very hot among them, every one finding matter enough to feed his own humour of self-worthiness. But the former device of assembling in one pavilion, made all quiet; the conclusion ever being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giving advice, and best able to reward, by means of the authority given him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these means he won to himself many of those, who had most power to do good or hurt.

How Antigonus, coming to set upon Eumenes, was driven off with loss.

Antigonus, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Province of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and drive him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soon as he had made himself strong enough, he removed out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, he marched directly against the enemies, with intent to give them battel. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Susa, and was retired back toward Perfia, keeping the River of Tigris between him and his pursuers. The passages of the River were well guarded, and good espial kept upon Antigonus, to observe which way he took. Before he came to Tigris itself, he was to pass over Coprates, a great River; and not foordable, which he sought to do by small Vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Army had gotten over, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge upon Tigris, came with a thousand horse, and four thousand foot, to see their demeanor: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them; and drove them headlong back into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned; very few escaping with life, except four thousand that yielded themselves prisoners in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieve them. This loss made Antigonus glad to fall off; and the heat of that Country in the Dog-days, breeding diseases in his Army, by which many perished, caused him to remove as far as into Media. So he took Pytho with him; (leaving Seleucus to besiege the Castle of Susa) and seeking to go the nearest way; passed through Savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media, with his Troops that were quite heart-broken.

S. III.

Of Eumenes his cunning. A Battel between him and Antigonus.

AFTER his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their business. Fain he would have had them to enter upon those Provinces, which Antigonus had left behind him; to which also the Captains of the Argyraspides or Silver-shields, were very inclinable, as desiring to draw near to Greece. But Peneftes, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their own particular Estates, and would needs march Eastward. These carried it; for the Army was not strong enough to divide it self into parts.

When

S. IV.

Of divers stratagems practised by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one against the other.

WHEN they came into Perfia, Peneftes ruling there, feasted them royally, and fought by all means to win the Souldiers love to himself. Eumenes perceiving whereunto those doings tended, suffered him a while to keep good cheer, till the time of War drew near. Then did he feign an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Governor of Armenia, to Peneftes himself. The purport whereof was; that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent over a great Army under Polyperchon, to joyn with Eumenes. These news, as they filled the Camp with vain joy, so they wrought in all mens minds a great willingness to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest appearance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being far the most sufficient Commander, as they found soon after. For when Antigonus, coming out of Media, drew near unto them, Eumenes, by some mischance was fallen sick, and fain to be carried in a Litter; the Army marched in very bad array, and was likely to have been forced to take battel in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captains were amazed, was carried about the Army in his Litter, and upon the sudden did cast his men into so good form, that Antigonus, perceiving him afar off, could not refrain from giving him deserved commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captains, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiving him, he came to the trial of a battel. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, he was inferior in number both of horse and foot by a third part. The battel was fought with variable success, and great loss on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victory was uncertain. For Eumenes could not force his men to lye far from their carriages: by which means Antigonus (who had a more absolute command over his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies, which was accounted the sign of victory; for he buried his own, and gave leave to his enemies craving it, to do the like. But a greater sign of victory had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not only buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Country round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (having tarried but one day) to steal away by night, and return into Media, from whence he came.

THUS did the War continue doubtful, and was protracted to a greater length, each part having stout Souldiers, and skilful Generals: but the side which had hitherto prevailed, being hindered by the equal authority of many, from pursuing all advantages to the best, Antigonus grew daily weaker, in men and reputation, so that to repair himself he could find no way safer, than to put all to adventure. He knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered far asunder, so that if he could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distress. Between him and them, the way was not long, being only nine days journey, but very bad, through a rough dry wilderness, hardly passable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Country well peopled, but requiring twenty five days journey, he forsook; partly for the length, partly, and chiefly, because he would come undiscovered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of Winter, he forbad unto his men the use of fire by night, because he would not have them discryed afar off. This commandment had been well observed four or five days, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being near to their ways end. The light of these fires gave notice of their coming; which being reported to Peneftes, and other Captains, they were so astonished with the sudden danger, that in all haste they betook themselves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the news, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisurely, and willing them to abide, and draw up their men together. They could scarce believe him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He took with him some companies of the readiest men, wherewith he occupied certain tops of mountains, looking toward the Camp of Antigonus: there he chose a convenient ground to encamp upon, and made great store of fires in sundry places, as if the whole Army had been present. This was a sorrowful spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himself prevented of his purpose; and began to fear lest he should be compelled to fight, whilst his men were tired with a long and painful journey. There-fore fore he resolved to turn aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serve to refresh his Army. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how ready Enmenes would be upon all advantages. But after a while, considering that no enemy stirred about him, he began to pause, and think in himself, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some Inhabitants of that desert to be taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had seen no other Army than his thereabout, but only a few men that kept fires on the hill-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to find that he had been so deluded. Therefore he went against these Troops with great fury, meaning to take sharp vengeance on them, for having so deceived him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much business, and long stay. All the Army was come, save only Endammus, Captain of the Elephants, who, besides those beasts, had no more than four hundred horsemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this supply coming to his enemies, sent above two thousand horse, and all his light-armed foot-men, to cut it off by the way. Endammus being fallen into this danger, was fain to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and so to defend himself as well as he could; for his horse-men, overlaid with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driven to run away upon the spur. Neither knew they, who fate upon the Elephants, which way to turn them, for on all sides they received wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremity there appeared brave Troops of horse and foot, that came unexpected to the rescue; and charging the Assailants upon the back, drove them to seek their own safety by speedy flight. These were sent by Enmenes; who though he knew not what his Adversary meant to do, yet he knew very well what was fittest for him to do: and therefore, playing both games himself, provided the remedy.

s. V.

The conspiracy of Pencestes and others, against Enmenes his life.

BY these means Enmenes won great honor, and was by the whole Army acknowledged a most expert General, and well worthy of the chief command. But Pencestes, and the other Captains, guilty of their own much insufficiency, were so transported with Envy, that they could no longer contain their vile thoughts, but held communication, as upon a necessary point, how they might find means to murder him.

Surely, it is great injustice to impute the mischief contrived against worthy men, to their own proud carriage, or some other ill deserving: For, though it often happen, that small vices do serve to counterpoise great virtues; (the sense of evil being more quick and lasting than of good) yet he shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimony, will think it a part of wisdom, to find good reason of the evils done to virtuous men, which oftentimes have no other cause than virtue it self. Enmenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of singular courtesie, of a very sweet conversation among his friends, and careful by all gentle means to win their love, that seemed to bear him any secret ill affection. It was his meek virtue that overthrew him, which even they that sought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he should not be slain, before the battle were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be governed by his direction. Of this treason he was quickly advertised by Endammus, to whom he had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom he used to borrow money when he needed not, to the end that they should be careful of his good, for fear of losing their own. Considering therefore, and discouaging with himself of the villany intended against him, he made his last Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of secret: which done, he revolved many things in his mind; being doubtful what course he were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royal blood, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. Few things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to seek their help, that needed his. To make his own peace with Antigonus, had been against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that he forbore either to lose the battle willingly, or to fly into Cappadocia, and make shift for himself among his old friends. At length he resolved to do his best against the common enemy, and afterwards to look to himself as well as he might.

s. VI.

The last battle between Antigonus and Enmenes.

THE Souldiers, especially those old bands of the Silver-shields, finding Enmenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victory, but only to bring them in the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacrity was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chief Commanders were so mischievously bent against him, that they could not endure to think of being beholding to him for the victory. Yet he ordered the battle so well, that, without their own great fault, they could hardly fail of getting the upper hand.

Before the Armies came to joining, a horseman from the side of Enmenes, proclaimed with a loud voice unto the followers of Antigonus, That their wickedness in fighting against their own Fathers, would now be punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vain, for the Silver-shields were men of threescore or seventy years old, and strengthened more by continual exercise, than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as having passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight.

Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often been beaten by them, and were now to try their last hope with these resolute warriors, the most Ancient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very pensive, and advanced heavily, suspecting their own cause, and fearing that the threatnings uttered would prove true.

Antigonus was now again far the stronger in horse, which gave him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plain levelled field. Placing therefore himself and his son Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Pythion, he did set forward courageously against the Enemies, that were ready to give him a sharp entertainment.

Enmenes took unto him Pencestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battle, in the face of Antigonus; meaning both to prevent the Traytors, his Companions, of all means to make head against him on the sudden; and (withal) to give proof of his own valour, which perhaps he should no more do, in the face of all his Enemies. In the right wing, opposite unto Pythion, he bestowed the weakest of his Horse and Elephants, under one Périp, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reasonable retreat, expecting the event of the other side.

So they joined very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himself master of all; Enmenes, to die an honorable death, or to win such a victory upon his open enemies, as might give him leisure and opportunity to deal with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being, even in their own opinions, far inferior to those whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently defeated by the Silver-shields, who flew above five thousand of them, losing of their own not one man. But in Horse, Enmenes was so over-matched, that he could not repel Antigonus, who pressed him very hard, but was fain to stand wholly upon defence. Yet his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the Enemy could not win one foot of ground upon him, until such time as Pencestes, with one thousand five hundred Horse, withdrew himself out of the battle, leaving his companions fighting to defend his back.

Then did Enmenes desperately rush amongst his Enemies, labouring to break open the way unto Antigonus himself. And though he failed of his purpose; yet with great slaughter he did so beat upon them which came in his way, that the victory hung a long time in suspense, uncertain which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandy mould, through the trampling of horses, men and Elephants, did cast up such a cloud of dust, as hindered the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this advantage, dispatched away some companies of Horse, that passed undiscovers beyond Enmenes his battels, and came to his carriages, which lay about half a mile from the place of fight, slyly guarded (for that the whole body of the Army lay between them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Pencestes retired himself no further than unto the carriages, he might not only have defended them, but peradventure have surprized those which came to surprize them, and so have done as good a piece of service as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the event; and Enmenes was so over-laboured both in body and mind, that he could not possibly give an eye to every place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It

It hapned so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himself every way overcharged, began to give back, and withdrew himself and his companies in good order, to the other side of the battel, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from loss. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well content to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come again; as fain he would have done.

The loss of the carriages was reported unto him, as soon as he had any leisure to hear how things went: whereupon he presently ordered his men for a fresh charge, and sent for Pencestes that was not far off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby he trusted, not only to recover their own goods, but to enrich themselves with the spoils of the enemies. Pencestes not only refused to joyn with him, but immediately withdrew himself into a safer place, where he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By this the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to return unto their Camps. Yet Antigonus conceived hope of doing somewhat more, and therefore taking half his horsemen, he waited upon Eumenes a part of his way home-wards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other half he committed to Python, willing him to set upon the Silver-shields in their retreat; which yet he forbore to do, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battel ended; wherein Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foot: but the spoil which he got, by surprizing his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus, and slain.

Eumenes, coming into his Camp, and finding the Silver-shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to cheer them up, and put them in hope of recovering all with advantage. For their brave demeanor that day had so crueld the enemy, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in openfield, and was much less able to draw their Carts after him, through that great wilderness, over the high mountains.

But these persuasions availed nothing.

Pencestes was gone; the other Captains would needs return into the high Countries; and the Souldiers had no desire either to fly or to fight, but only to recover their goods. Wherefore Tentamus, one of the two Captains of the Silver-shields (who had in former times readily consented unto trayterous motions, in hope of gain, but was lured by his partner Antigenes) finding, as he thought a fit occasion of making himself great, and winning the love of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore unto those old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the only reward of their services, in the Wars of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtle man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with little entreaty, perform a great deal more than they promised; and therefore he lovingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of far greater matters than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make War against him. This answer pleased them; so well, that they forthwith devised how to deliver him alive. Wherefore coming about him, as at other times, to do their duty, and pretending more joy of their victory, than sorrow of their loss, which they said they would redeem by another fight; in the midst of this goodly talk, they leapt upon him, caught hold of his sword, and bound him fast. So they halted him away; and, stopping their ears against all persuasions, would not yield so far as to loosen one of his hands, and let him kill himself, but brought him alive (that was their own General, under whom they had obtained many victories) as it had been in triumph, into the Camp of their enemies.

The press of men, running out of the Camp to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was fain to send a guard of Horsemen and Elephants, to keep him from being smothered; whom he could not suddenly resolve either to kill or save. Very few they were that were fued for his life, but of these, Demetrius the son of Antigonus was one, the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were saved, he would soon be the chief in reputation, for his great ability. So, after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded that it was the safest way to put him to death; which intending to have done by famine (perhaps because he would keep it a while in his own power, to reverse the sentence, as desiring, if it might be, to have him live his friend) haste of other business made him do it by the sword.

To this end came all the travels of that worthy General Eumenes; who had with great wisdom, fidelity and patience, laboured in vain to uphold the family which God had purposed to cast down. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutability, but more notable was his Government of himself, in all her changes. Adversity never lessened his courage, nor prosperity his circumspection. But all his virtue, industry and wit, were cast away, in leading an Army, without full power, to keep it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered by Gesser de Coligny, Admiral of France in our days, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soon after in the massacre of Paris: That rather than to lead again an Army of Voluntaries, he would dye a thousand times.

Antigonus himself gave to the body of Eumenes Honourable Funerals; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserved vengeance. One chief Captain of the Silver-shields he burnt alive; many of the other Captains he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Silver-shields, that had betrayed so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader that should carry them into far Countries, under pretence of Wars; but with a privy charge, to consume them all, as perjured wretches, letting none of them return alive unto his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas that beat upon the shores of Greece and Macedonia.

§. VIII.

How Antigonus slew Python, and occupied Media. How he removed Governors of Provinces, and made himself Lord of Persia, carrying away Peucetes.

THE two Armies being joyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter: the common Souldier idly; the principal men intently bent unto the business ensuing. Python began to consider his own deservings; for the whole War had been chiefly maintained by the strength, and riches of this Province. Besides, he thought himself as good a man as Antigonus, unless it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he judged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assuage them with great liberality. But in following this course he was driven by necessity, to trust many, of whom he stumbled upon some, that were unsecret, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discovered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Python) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of dissention between him, and his honorable friend, unto whom he meant to commit the Government of all those Countries: his own business calling him into the lower Asia. These reports coming daily to his ears, did finely delude Python. By his greatness with Alexander; his authority in that Province where they lay, wherof he was Governor; and the love of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintain, even an offensive War. But what need had he to use the sword, when he was likely without contention, to obtain more than his own asking? Therefore he came as soon as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to divide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing less than to yield to any such division. As soon as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to dye, and slain out of hand. For Antigonus, having begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting down indifferently all that stood in his way: but swam carelessly through the blood, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this business was ended, he appointed a new Governor in Media, to order the Province, and a Captain, to suppress all commotions: thinking belike that the power and authority, so divided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were derived.

After this he marched into Persia, where he was entertained as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he understood his own mightiness. For he placed and displaced at his own pleasure, Governors in all Provinces, leaving none in Office, that were not his own creatures, except such as lay too far off to be dislodged easily.

Pencestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheer to redeem old offences; but was deceived, having to do with one that could not be taken with such baits: he was carried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that never after took effect. Thus he, that envied the virtue of his friend, was driven to flatter (in vain) the fortune of his enemy, after which he led a most contemptible life, till he died obscurely a man forgotten.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

Seleucus was the next in this Visitation; Some that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good will to Antigonus, and now gave proof of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Captain of the Castle of Susa to meet him on the way, rendering unto him that strong Piece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though having in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly believe it; but used him with excessive kindness, for fear so good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of money, made up five and twenty thousand talents. Having all this, he might well account himself a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happiness. But large dominion was the mark at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent to leave no Country behind his back, that should not acknowledge him for Sovereign Lord. Coming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus, with all possible demonstration of love, and honored with presents befitting the Majesty of a King. All this he accepted with great gravity, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the revenues of that Province. This demand Seleucus held unreasonable; saying, That it was not needful for him to render unto any man an account of that Province, which was given unto him, in respect of his many good services to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficeth, that Antigonus was powerful; who urged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessity, moved Antigonus to press him thus, but only the desire to pick matter of quarrel against him, whereof it was likely that he should find such issue, as Pytho and Pencester had done. Therefore taking with him only fifty horse, he conveyed himself away, and fled into Phoenician Dominions; desiring about to oppress all, that in former times had been his betters, or at least his equals. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countries were yielded unto him without battel, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his desire, having received many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange Prophecy to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himself; and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recover Babylon, yea, win all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battel. Easie believers may give credit to this tale. Had it been true, methinks Antigonus rather should have hanged those Chaldeans, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whom the Destinies preferred for so great purposes. When he had settled things at Babylon, he took his journey into Cilicia, where he wintered. There he took up ten thousand Talents more of the Kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yearly income to amount unto eleven thousand Talents.

CHAP. V.

Of the great War between Alexanders Captains: and how they assumed the Name and State of Kings.

The Combination of Ptolomy, Cassander, and others against Antigonus. Their demands, and his Answer.

His great riches, and the rest of his Power, made Antigonus dreaded, envied and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new War. Ptolomy, Cassander and Lysimachus, had privily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason than of his own accord he seemed like to yield unto. Of their practices he had some notice; the good entertainment given unto Seleucus, giving him sufficient sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them severally, entreating them to continue firm in their love toward him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomy, it being likely that a good Army should prevail more than a fair message. Therefore, as soon as the season of the year would permit, he took the way toward Syria, and was encountered by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much rejoyce at his victory obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honor that he had thereby gotten. In which War, so far as they being his Confederates, must have endured great loss, with hazard of their whole Estates, if the contrary faction had prevailed; they held it very just, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voyage, where-in they had been all adventurers. Wherefore they desired him, that making between them all an equal division of the treasures that were in his hands (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best be to every ones liking, if he would make over Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering upon the Hellespont, to Lysimachus: for whereas his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victory, he might well spare some of those Western Provinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomy, he would not crave any new addition, but rest contented within his own Territories. Provided always, that Seleucus their common Friend, and partner in the late War, might be restored to his own, out of which he had been driven so injuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent unto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtain with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses received, he should yet be able to redeem Peace whensoever he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was he so weak, to give away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for fear only, lest it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to find them work, more than enough to defend their own. Therefore he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victory, which he alone without others help had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, having by his means kept their Government, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polyperchon, and the council of estate in Macedon. But what marvel was it, if they considered not how he had saved them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when coming to him as a fugitive, and begging succour, he was by his meere bounty relieved, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said he) in those days command me to (surrender Provinces, and give him his equal share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired me to pity him, and help him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Army, and Fleet, on confidence whereof he now presumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, How can he complain of wrong, that durst not stay to plead his right? I did use him well, but his conscience told him that he had deserved ill; else he would not have fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their own, which some of them can hardly justify. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings, and after him to deal with others, if they continue to provoke me.

§. II.

The preparation and beginnings of the Wars.

When the Embassadors were dismissed with this answer, nothing was thought upon but War. Antigonus perceiving that he should be invaded from Europa, as soon as he was entered into Syria, left his Nephew Ptolomy to guard the Sea-coast, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia: giving him also charge, to drive out of Cappadocia, some that were already sent over to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not unprovided of money; to draw friends to his side, and raise up troubles to his enemies. Especially, he laboured to make himself the strongest by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than foreclosed his journey into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Navy. Therefore, having erected Beacons, and laid post-horses throughout all Asia, to give swift advertisement of all occurrences, he invaded Syria, that was not held against him him by any power sufficient to maintain the field.

Polomy lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloved and honored of the people as their natural Lord: his other Provinces be kept with a few Garrisons, better serving to contain the people within obedience, than to confront a foreign enemy. So Antigonus took many Cities and Places of that Country, and began to set great numbers of Artificers on work in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these businesses he consumed a year and three months; not idly. For he took Joppe and Gaza, which were yielded unto his discretion, and well used. The strong City of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it self upon composition, that Antigonus Souldiers might depart with their Arms; which was permitted.

Polomy was not asleep, whilst these things were in doing, though he kept himself within the bounds of Egypt, as indeed it behoved him to do. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plain field, but likely they were to encrease, which made him willing to protract the time. Nevertheless by Sea (where his enemy was as yet unready) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chief command.

Seleucus passed with an hundred sail along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus and his Army, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then governed by many petty Lords: of whom the greatest adhered to Polomy, the rest were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptian with sharp steel.

The same commodity of aid by Sea, encouraged the President of Caria (called also Cassander, but not the Son of Antipater, howsoever by the painful and Learned Writer Reinerus Reineccius, he is, by some oversight, counted for the same) to declare for Polomy and his Confederates, and busily employ in their quarrel all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutrality, and thereby enjoyed rest; but now he threw himself into dangerous War, chusing rather to undergo trouble at hand, than to fall under certain ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would have overwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

§. III.

How each party sought to win the assistance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration against Cassander. Alexander the Son of Polyperchon revolteth from Antigonus, who had set him up.

IN the mean season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure unto them the people of Greece, whose aid, which way soever inclined, was of great importance. Herein at the first, Antigonus sped to well by large effusion of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedemonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom he waged eight thousand; and caused Polyperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowle himself again, and taking upon him the title of Captain of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopeful beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kind. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, he called together both his own Souldiers, and all the Greeks and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, that Cassander had very cruelly slain Olympias, Mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had shut up in close prison the poor Lady Roxane, Alexander Wife, and his Son begotten on her body. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himself King over the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Lady Thestalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match unfit for a man of no greater parentage than he, to joyn with him in marriage. That in meer despite of those dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new City by him built, and called by his own name Cassandria; and had re-edified the City of Thebes, which for the great treason of the Inhabitants, was levelled with the ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons he required them to make a Decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute liberty the Lady Roxane, and her Son; and should yield obedience to the Lord Lieutenant General of the Empire (by which name Antigonus himself was understood) or else should be reputed a Traytor, and open Enemy to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored into freedom: this he did, not because he was careful of their good, but for the need which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was was perwaded, that not only the Greeks would adhere unto him, as to their loving Patron, and fall off from Cassander, but that the rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardful of nothing but his own benefit, would correct their opinion, and think him the most faithful of all others to the Royal blood. But concerning his loyalty to the young Prince, the world was too wise to be deceived with vain shews. His undertaking for the liberty of the Greeks was more effectual, and got easier belief, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Polomy strove to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to win to himself that valiant Nation, which afforded men far more serviceable in War, than were to be found in any Province of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all sure, deceived himself, not without great cost. For he gave to Alexander the Son of Polyperchon five hundred talents, willing him to let the War on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appear, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassander men had with much blood-shed, grievously afflicted the contrary faction, and he himself perceiving, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way to make what use he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furnished with plenty of gold, wherewith he was able not only to win the doubtful, but to corrupt such as might seem best assured; he thought it a part of wisdom, to surrender upon fair conditions, that which he could not assure himself to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent one to deal with Alexander about the matters in controversy; telling him, that Antigonus was very skilful in setting men together by the ears, not caring who prevailed, but only desiring to have them weary themselves, whilst he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might find opportunity to set upon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keep in his purse the five hundred talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus, it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander; provided, that he should from thenceforth renounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure and faithful league with Polomy, Cassander, and the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise he might well perwade himself, that the Country which his Father could not keep, when he was indeed the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste be won by him, that was only the Factor of a proud injurious man, so styling himself, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had lived a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discover the intent (which he did not carry very secret) of making himself absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soon entreated to accept so good an offer; and did not stick to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subject unto no mans control.

Howbeit, this his honor continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by treason of the Sicyonians; who thinking thereby to have made themselves free, were soon after vanquished in battle by Cratippus, Alexander Wife, a discreet and valiant Lady. She in revenge of her Husbands death, crucified thirty of the Citizens taken in fight; and having by severity taught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Army in good order, and governed those places that she held, with the commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

§. IV.

The Etolians rise against Cassander in favour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A Fleet, and Land Army of Antigonus utterly defeated by Ptolomies Lieutenant. In what terms the War stood at this time. Antigonus draws nearer to Greece.

Antigonus, when he found, that with so much money he had only bought an enemy, began to raise troubles to Cassander, and his other Adversaries in Greece; by stirring up the Etolians against them: Likewise he laboured to win to his party the Islands in the Greek Seas, by whose assistance he might be the better able to deal with Polomy, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong Fleet. But neither of these attempts had the success which he expected. The Etolians, a factious Nation, and always envying the greatness of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gains equalled not their losses. Cassander was one of their own Country, fortified the Acaruanians against them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Illyrians, whom he vanquished in battle, to forsake their side, and bind himself, self to bear no Arms against Cassanders friends.

On the other side, as many petty Islands were drawn to joyn with Antigonus; so the Fleet of the Rhodians under Theodatus, who was Admiral to Antigonus, passing along the coast of Asiat towards Cyprus, with an Army under conduct of Perillus marching on the shore for mutual assistance, was quite overthrown by Ptolomies Navy. Polyclitus, who in Ptolomies behalf had been sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no need of his service in that Country, because Alexander was come over to their side, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surprized. He rode with his Fleet behind a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, whereinto Perillus falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, and many were slain, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admiral perceiving this, made all haste to help his fellows that were on Land; but whilst he with all his Fleet were intentive only to that business, Polyclitus appeared at their backs; who as soon as he perceived their disorder, hastened about the Cape, and charging them behind, suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deal with Ptolomy about some composition. First, he sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yield unto the demands of Ptolomy: so the parley was vain.

Hitherto each part seemed to have indifferently sped in the War, and thereby to have equal cause of hope and fear. This late Victory, with the good success of his affairs in Cyprus, did seem to make amends to Ptolomy for his losses in Syria. Likewise the revolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the confederacy made between the Ætolians and him; as also those petty skirmishes, that had been in Asia the less, to Antigonus his advantage, were sufficiently recompenced by others of like regard, but adverse to him, and by the troubles brought upon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the loss of his men, money and ships, no otherwise than as the pairing of his nails, that were left long enough, and would easily grow again, but the enlargement of his Territory by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate; as if thereby he had upon a limb of Ptolomy his enemy, and strengthened the body of his own Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, he meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no money.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his enemies upon Asia the less; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to fear, lest the people being tied unto him by no bond of allegiance, might upon small occasion revolt from him, to men of as honorable reputation as he himself. To prevent this, and to be nearer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affairs did seem to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Army in Syria, under his Son Demetrius, to whom being then but two and twenty years old, he appointed many ancient Captains, as Assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

§. V.

How Lyfimachus and Cassander vanquished some enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good success of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

THE coming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the process of his business thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to think upon molesting him in Asia: they themselves were held over-hardly to their own work on Europe side. Scuthes a King of the Thracians, joyning with some Towns that rebelled against Lyfimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrel. All these relied upon Antigonus, who was to help them with money and other aid. The Ætolians likewise took courage, and rose against Cassander, having Æacides, lately restored to the Kingdom of Epirus, their Assistant. But Lyfimachus gave unto his Rebels no time to content themselves. He suddenly presented himself before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by fear to return unto their former duty. He fought a battle with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and drove them out of the Country. Finally, he overcame Scuthes; and following the heat of his Victory, slew Pansanius in Battle, whom Antigonus had sent over with an Army; and all his men he did either put to ranfome, or fill up with them his own Bands. The like success had

Philip,

Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Ætolians. For he waited their Country; fought with the Epirotes, that came to help them: and after the victory, fought again with their forces joyned in one, overthrowing them, and, killing Æacides that unfortunate King. Finally, he drove the Ætolians out of most of their Country, and forced them to seek their safety among the wild Mountains. Of the Epirotes he sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principal Authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present War.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his Adversaries with painful travel; after which they remained only favours. Antigonus himself at fair leisure wan all Caria the whilst, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing liberty upon all the Cities he took out of Cassanders hands. The whole Country of Peloponnesus (excepting Stigon and Corinth) with the Isle of Euboea, and many places of the firm Land, were by those means won to be his in true and vehement affection, ready to do or suffer any thing for him that had made so evident a demonstration of his readiness, to give them the liberty in deed, which others had promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would fain have shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if he would pass over into Macedon: by which terror he forced Cassander to repair thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leaving many good Towns of Greece too weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to help themselves, if any foreign succour appeared. The aid which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenant of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Cassanders departure, entered the Country; drove his Garrisons out of divers Cities; forced the Governor of Athen to enter into league with their Lord; wan the Citadel of Thebes, and set the people at liberty. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before been raised out of her old mines by the meer power of Cassander, of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had been some heinous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the City, and the love of the Inhabitants, only by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thank the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to look forward upon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward upon their miserable nullity, that held them incapable of being any thing.

§. VI.

Victories of Ptolomy by Sea. A great Battle at Gaza, which Ptolomy and Seleucus man, against Demetrius the Son of Antigonus.

AS the preference or neerfulness of Antigonus gave life to his affairs in the lower Asia and Greece; so the designs of his enemies, taking advantage at his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Eastern parts, wherewith in the year preceeding he had over-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wavered between contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their covenant with Ptolomy, was visited by an Egyptian Fleet, wherewith Ptolomy, in his own person easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leaving a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Governor of the whole Country. With the same Fleet he ran along the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoils of which he enriched his followers, and returned laden to Cyprus. Demetrius the Son of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers Subjects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his horfes, and light-armed foot with him, because the business required expedition. But in vain did he tire himself and his followers, in hasty seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deep, could in a few minutes delude the labour of so many days, if need had so required. Answerable to the vanity of this expedition was the success. For Ptolomy was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether having lightened his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, he would return upon those maritime Countries, or make towards Syria, where his coming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a Royal Army, which he levied with all convenient speed, for the recovery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was fain to chuse out of uncertainties the most likelihood, and return the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for service in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. He had scarce refreshed his men and horses in Syria, when the news arrived of Ptolemies coming with a puissant Army, to give him battle. Hereupon he called to counsel his principal friends, who advised him to give way to the time, and expect some better opportunity in the future, being a young man, and weakly furnished with means to resist such ancient and famous Generals, as Ptolemy and Seleucus. This counsel seemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of those aged men that gave it, than from any necessity growing out of the present business. For Demetrius considering himself to be the Son of Antigonus, and now General of his Fathers Army, thought his own title weighty enough to be laid in balance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found he much reason that should move him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore persuading himself, that such odds of number, and of great fame, would rather serve to adorn his victory, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolved to put the matter to trial, without expecting the advantage of more help. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoil and rewards, he abode the coming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soon as they had finished their wearisome journey over the Desarts of Arabia.

Ptolemy and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Province as Egypt, came so well provided of all necessities, that their Army felt not any great grievance of the evil way, when battle was presented them, which confidently they undertook. In all things else they had the odds of Demetrius; of Elephants they were utterly unprovided. But how to deal with those Beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kind of Palisado, fastened strongly together with chains, and sharpened in such a manner, that the Elephants could not seek to break upon it, without receiving much hurt. The rest of their forces (which besides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate services, by them performed that year, whilst the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vain journeys, or long and dulling expectation) they disposed in such order, as belied answered to the form, wherein Demetrius was embattled. The fight began, and was maintained with equal courage, for a long time, each part striving more to win honor, than to satisfy any other passion, as having little cause of hatred, or revenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who upon necessity would needs fight a battle with disadvantage, began to appear by his losses. He had committed himself to Fortune, having more to lose by her than he could get: but in this fight he was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; unless it may be said, that the terror brought upon his men, by the loss of his Elephants, was bad luck. Those beasts were in that kind of War hardly to be resisted on plain ground; and therefore at the first they made great spoil amongst Ptolemy's men. Afterward seeking to break thorow the Palisado, they were sorely hurt, and every one of them taken. This disaster caused the horsemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and prevailed little, till now perceiving that all multyde upon their hands, who were ill able to make their own places good, they began to shrink, and many of them to provide for their safety by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had stroven so long in vain to make his men abide, that he himself was likely to be lost; he was fain to give place to the stronger, making a violent retreat as far as to Azotus, which was about thirty miles from the place of Battle. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to save such goods, as in haste they could pack up. This foolish covetousness was their destruction, and the loss of the Town. For whilst they, forgetful of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter-horses, and cloyed up the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch; others, to carry out what they had already laden, Ptolemy's Army brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the City altogether.

This Victory restored unto Ptolemy the best part of Syria, a Province more easie in those times to get, than to keep; and opened the way unto all the greatness of Seleucus. For between Gaza and Phœnicia no place offered resistance. In Celosyria and Phœnicia, some Towns held out a while, but were soon taken in by Ptolemy. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrrus and Sydon; of which Sydon was given up by the Inhabitants; Tyrrus by the Garrison, falling to mutiny against their Captain, who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolemy, and honorably entertained in respect of his fidelity.

How Seleucus recovered Babylon, and made himself Lord of many Countries in the highest Asia. The Era of the Kingdom of the Greeks, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

WHILE Ptolemy followed his business with such prosperity, Seleucus took leave of him, and went up to Babylon, to try his own fortune; which he found so favourable, that recovering first his own Province, he became at length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of unlikelihoods. His train consisted of no more than eighteen hundred foot, and two hundred horse, a number too small to have been placed as Garrison, in some one of those main great Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needful, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Governor, that none of them would find courage to resist him; but left that work to Antigonus his own men, wishing them ill to speed. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of War, which by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensigns. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves joyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so general, it was not a safe course for the Antigoniats, to thrust themselves into the Towns of most importance: for every man of them should have been troubled with daily enemies in his own lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and try the matter by fight. But the treason of one principal man, who revolted to the enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismayed the rest, that they did no more than seek to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his security in those quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly took it; and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the utmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his own great Army lay between them and all enemies. Therefore when the victory at Gaza had opened unto Seleucus the way into those parts; he found little impediment in the rest of his business. Having now gotten what he fought, it behoved him to seek how he might keep his gettings: for his own forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not do for him, his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, joining unto himself, out of Persia and other Countries, all needful help, came, with ten thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse, either to save all from being lost, or to drive Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had only four hundred Horse, and somewhat above three thousand Foot, wherewith to oppose himself: his large Conquest of unwelcome Nations having yielded him many loving Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were near to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himself from the place where his resistance was expected, into certain marshes not far off; where he lay secretly waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that he had been fled, and was the less careful in fortifying his Camp. In recompence of this vain security, his Camp was taken by surprize, the first night of his arrival; the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captains, were slain; he himself was driven to flee for his life into the desarts, and the whole Army yielded unto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanor, after the victory, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This victory of Seleucus gave beginning unto the new stile of, the Kingdom of the Greeks, an account much used by the Greeks, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long dispute about the first year of this Era. The authority of that great Astrologer Ptolemy, from which there is no appeal, makes it plain, that the five hundred and nineteenth year of Nabonassar, was the fourscore and second year of this account. Other inference hereupon is needless, than that note of the learned Gauricus, that the first of these years, is reckoned complete, at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight years after Nabonassar. With the observation of the Saturn, recorded by Ptolemy, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding finding the same Planet to have been so placed in the sign of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had observed it, in the same year; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourcore and second year; and the last of the hundred thirty and seventh Olympiad. These observations of the celestial bodies, are the surest marks of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in History, and the years of succeeding Princes (that are not seldom ambiguous, by reason of unremembered factions) if they seem to be here-against; it is not greatly material. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these years of the Greeks were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one year, that is found between actions, related by the several Authors of the two Books of the Maccabees, who follow divers accounts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolemy, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a years distance.

How Ptolemy lost all he won in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed unto the Macedonians, by those that had been subject unto the Persian Empire. Of divers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill success.

IN a happy hour did Seleucus adventure to go up to Babylon, with so few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he stayed longer upon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolemy could have spared him none at all. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, having lost the battel at Gaza, received from Ptolemy all his own goods, his Pages, and Servants, in free gift, and therewithal a courteous message, to this effect: That no personal hatred was the ground of this War, which he and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only terms of honor, wherein they would seek to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrel, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolemy, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiting him, with some as brave liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken Troops; drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts, and advertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeem his honor lost. Antigonus upon the first news of this overthrow, had said, That the victory which Ptolemy won upon a beardless Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet upon desire that his son, whom he tenderly loved, should amend his own reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolemy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nevertheless follow his own business in Calabria; thinking it enough to spend part of his Army under Cilles his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those, that had been already vanquished, when Cilles too much undervalued the power of such an Enemy. He thought that this young Gallant, having lately saved his life by flight, would now be more careful of having a fair way at his back, than adventurous in setting further forward, than urgent reason should provoke him. In this confidence he passed on without all fear; as one that were already Master of the field, and should meet with none, that would issue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this careless march; he took the lightest of his Army, and made his journey with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came upon Cilles unexpected, and was on the sudden, without any battel, Master of his Camp: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit served not only to repair the credit of Demetrius, which his loss at Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompense the bounty of Ptolemy, with equal favour, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolemy so weakened by this loss, nor Demetrius so emboldened by his victory, that any matter of consequence thereupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolemy; and therefore he fortified himself in places of advantage: Ptolemy on the other side was loth to engage himself in an enterprize, wherein he might perceive, that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either be driven to make a shameful retreat, or a dangerous adventure of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeed, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whither he made all haste, not so much to relieve his son, as to embrace him. For he rejoiced exceedingly, that the young man had so well acquitted quitted himself, and being left to his own advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to encrease the reputation of this late victory, he brought such forces, as might serve to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honor of all should be referred unto the good foundation laid by his son; whom from this time forwards, he employed in matters of greatest importance.

Ptolemy had now less reason to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to have assailed the Camp of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of consultation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captains advised him to retire into Egypt, alledging many good arguments to that purpose: which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his own intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good success against Perdiccas, in the like defensive War. So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honor; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any sudden passion of fear: and he departed at fair leisure, not only carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismantle some principal Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Country that he left at his back, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easy was it in those times, for the Captain of a strong Army, to make himself Lord of a great Province.

We may justly wonder, that these Kingdoms of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations (which the victory of Alexander had over-run with so hasty a course, as gave him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not only by himself, but by the Captains of his Army after him. The hot contentions for superiority between the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; between Egypt and Babylon; Babylon and Ninive; the Persians and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to have once been in those people; which are now so patient of a foreign yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, fought for, won, lost, and again recovered by contentious Masters; as if they had no title to their own heads, but were born to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more strange, if we shall consider, how the several States of Greece (many of which had never possessed so large Dominion, as might cause their Spirits to swell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occasions of liberty: and how these proud Conquerors were glad to offer it, desiring to have them rather friends than servants, for fear of further inconvenience.

It must therefore be noted, that most of these Countries had always been subject unto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long since had rooted out, and held them in such bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of foreign Masters. This had utterly taken from them all remembrance of home-born Princes, and incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: so that wanting within themselves all sovereign power, or high authority, the life and spirit of every Estate; they lay as dead, and were bereaved of motion, when that Kingdom fell, whereof they lately had been members.

Why the Persian Satraps, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captains after the death of Alexander, strive to lay hold upon those Provinces, which had many ages been subject unto them, and scarce four years in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conqueror did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispose of them of their new purchases: it is a question, wherein who is not satisfied, may find no less reason to suspect the History, than authority to confirm it. For we seldom read, that any small Kingdom, prevailing against a far greater, hath made to entire a conquest, in the compass of ten years, as late unto the vanquished no hope of recovery, nor means to rebel; especially when such disorders, or rather utter confusion hath ensued, by the fury of civil War among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set down by Machiavel; and concerns all other Kingdoms, that are subject unto the like form of Government: the sum whereof is this; Wherefoever the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of slaves, there is the conquest easy, and soon assured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to win all, and harder to keep that which is won. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdom of France. If any Invader should prevail so far upon Turkey, that the great Sultan and his Children (for Brethren he useth not to suffer alive) were taken or slain: the whole Empire would quickly be won, and easily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Baffaes, how great soever they may seem, are meer slaves; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personal regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, wherein hope of private gain should not countervail, all apparent matter of fear. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Country, and were by far the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Royal blood, there are in that Kingdom store of great men; whose might in their several Countries, and having certain Royalities and Principalities of their own, are able to raise War in all quarters of the Realm; whereunto the remembrance of their own ancient Families, and long continued Nobility, will always stir up and inflame them: so that until every one piece were won, and every one (an endless work) of the chief Nobility brought under or destroyed, the victory were not complete, nor well assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobility, doth often times make way for an Invader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easily make a fair entrance. But such assistants are not so easily kept, as they are gotten; for they look to be satisfied at full, in all their demands; and having what they would, they soon return to their old allegiance, upon condition to keep what they have, unless they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himself. The Turks, on the other side, needs not to fear any peril, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principal men. The greatest mischief that any of them could work against him, were the betraying of some frontier Town, or the wilful loss of a battel: which done, the Traitor hath spent his time, and must either fly to the enemy, whereby he loseth all that he formerly did hold; or else, in hope of doing some further harm, he must adventure to excuse himself unto his Master, who seldom forgives the Captain, that hath not strived by desperate valour against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so joining themselves unto any Invader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them have any followers or dependants at all, other than such as are subject unto them, by virtue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principal men, doth leave unto them no means, whereby to oppose themselves against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giving him assistance, if adversity should make him stand in need of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turks Baffaes, or Provincial Governors, that knows either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the loss and utter ruin of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foot of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the subject, which is also a Kingdom unto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conqueror, who hath no other device painted on his Ensign, than the picture of slavery.

As is the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, void of liberty in the Subjects, and utterly destitute of other Nobility, than such as depended upon meer favour of the Prince. Some indeed there were of the Royal blood, and others, defended from the Princes that joyed with Darius, the son of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Magi: these were men of reputation in Persia, but their reputation consisted only in their Pedigree, and their safety in not meddling with affairs of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appear by this, that the Kings Uncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and so did stile themselves, in speaking unto these great Monarchs. That upon every light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaves; it is easy to be discerned, in that example of cruelty, practised by Xerxes upon his own brother Masties; which hath been formerly noted, in place more convenient. As for the Satrapae, or Governors of the Provinces, it is needless to cite examples, proving them to have been meer slaves: it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobility in Persia, may be added the general want of liberty convenient among the people: a matter no less available, in making ease and sure the conquest of a Nation, than is the cause assigned by Machiavel. For as Alexander his Aids did not care to run from the enemies, because it was not possible, that they should load him with heavier burthens, than his Master caused him daily to bear: so the Nations, that endure the worst under their own Princes, are not greatly fearful of a foreign yoke; Nor will be hasty to shake it off, if by experience they find it more light, than was that whereunto they had been long accustomed. This was it that made the Gaigoines bear such faithful affection to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildly than the French. This enlarged the Venetian jurisdiction in Lombardy; for the Towns that they wan, they wan out of the hands of Tyrannous oppressors: and this did cause the Macedonians, with other Nations that had been subject unto the posterity of Alexanders followers, to serve the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eased of many burthens, which had been imposed upon them by their own Kings.

So that of this tameness, which we find in those that had been subjects of the Persian Kings, the reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeed been absolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering upon Syria: against whom Antigonus sent part of his Army; thinking therewith to bring them under, or rather to get a rich booty. The Captains that he sent, fell upon the Nabatheans, at such time as they were busied in a great Mart; wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians for Mirrh, Frankincense, and other such commodities. All or most of these rich wares, together with five hundred talents of silver, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold upon: for their coming was sudden and unexpected. But ere they could recover Syria, the Nabatheans overtook them, and finding them weary with long marches, made such a slaughter, that of four thousand foot, and six hundred horse, only fifty horse escaped. To revenge this loss, Demetrius was set out with a great power: yet all in vain, for he was not resisted by any Army, but by the natural defence of a vast Wilderness, lack of water, and of all things necessary.

Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein he lost not much honour: for they craved it, and gave him presents. Returning from the Nabatheans, he viewed the Lake Asphaltites, whence he conceived hope of great profit, that might be raised, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandry of his Son, Antigonus was well pleased, and appointed men to the work: but they were slain by the Arabians, and so that hope vanished.

These petty enterprizes, with the ill success, accompanying them, had much impaired the good advantage against Ptolemy: when the news of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, married all together. For neither was the loss of those great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it safe to transport the War into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria, and the lower Asia should have been exposed to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius, with fifteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleucus. These forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his Son did less. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themselves from necessity of fight; some places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without setting in Garrison more men than he could spare, neither did he get much: and therefore was fain to set out the bravery of his Expedition, by burning and spoiling the Country; which he did thereby the more alienate, and, as it were, acknowledge to belong unto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his own assured.

Antigonus had laid upon his Son a peremptory commandment, to return unto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seem) that in such an unsettled state of things, either the War might be ended, by the fury of the first Brunt; or else it would be vain to strive against all difficulties likely to arise, where want of necessities should frustrate the valour, that by strength of time was like to become less terrible to the enemy. Demetrius therefore leaving behind him five thousand foot, and a thousand horse, rather to make shew of continuing the War, than to effect much, where himself with greater forces could do little more than nothing, forsook the enterprize, and went back to his Father.

A general Peace made and broken. How all the house of Alexander was destroyed.

THESE ambitious heads, having thus wearied themselves with uneffectual travel, in seeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no private hatred, but meer desire of Empire, had moved them to enter into the War; so was it no friendly reconciliation, but only a dulness growing upon the flow advancement of their several hopes, that made them willing to breathe a while, till occasion might better serve to fight again.

Besides that main point, Of retaining the Provinces which every man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gave a fair, but a false colour, to the business; That the Son of Alexander by Roxane, should be made King when he came to full age; and, That all the Estates of Greece should be set at liberty. The advancement of young Alexander to his Fathers Kingdom, seems to have been a matter forcibly extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discovered a purpose, to have made himself Lord of all. But this, indeed more nearly touched Cassander. For in his custody was the young Prince and his Mother: neither did he keep them in a sort answerable to their degree; but as close prisoners, taken in that War, wherein they, had seen the old Queen Olympias taken and murdered, that sought to put them in possession of the Empire. The mutual hatred and fear between them, rooted in these grounds, of injuries done, and revenge expected; upon this conclusion of peace, grew up faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who saw the Macedonians turn their favourable expectation, towards the Son of their late renowned King.

All this either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The young Prince must first have possession of Macedonia: whereby Cassander should be reduced to his poor office, of Captain over a thousand men; if not left in worse case. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either do as they had done under Arideus; or better, as being better acquainted with their own strength. He, in the mean time, by his readiness to acknowledge the true Heir, had freed himself from that ill-favoured imputation, of seeking to make himself Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like advantage had he in that Article, Of restoring the Greeks to their liberty. This liberty had hitherto been the subject of much idle discourse: but it never took effect. Antigonus held scarce any Town of theirs; Cassander occupied most of the Country: which if he should set free, he must be a poor Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrel against him, as against a Disturber of the common Peace.

In the mean season, the Countries lying between Euphrates and the Greek Seas, together with a great Army, and money enough to entertain a greater, might serve to hold up the credit of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes as high as ever they had been.

With much disadvantage do many men contend against one that is equal to them all in puissance. Cassanders friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not do without: for, where every one mans help is necessary to the War, there may any one make his own peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are weary. The best was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becoming Subjects unto any man, much less to the Son of an Asiatick woman, of whom they had long since refused to hear mention. Therefore he took a short course, and caudled both the Child and his Mother to be slain: freeing thereby himself in a trice, from the dangerous necessity of yielding up his Government, which he must have done when the Child had come to age.

Roxane was a Lady of singular beauty, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas desired to have her Son, being as yet unborn, proclaimed Heir to the great Alexander. Immediately upon the death of Alexander, she had used the favour (if it were not love) of Perdiccas, to the satisfying of her own bloody malice, upon Statira, the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custom of those Countries, wherein plurality of Wives is held no crime. For, having by a counterfeit Letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poor Lady into her hands, she did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled up with earth. But now, by Gods just vengeance, were the and her Son made a way, in the like secret fashion; even at such time as the near approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer unto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward show; as inwardly it was pleasing unto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords of all that they had under them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of War; wherein every one perfwaded himself of success, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Eysmachus and Seleucus, that had work enough at home) began to rowze themselves: as if now the time were come, for each man to improve his own stock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busy in Peloponnesus, and about Hellespont: while their Master was careful careful in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the liberty of Greece: yet did the same argument minister unto Ptolomy matter of quarrel, against both him and Cassander; Ptolomy complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Towns, which ought, in fair dealing, to be set at liberty. Under colour of redressing this enormity, he sent an Army into Cilicia, where he won four Towns, and soon after lost them, without much labour of his own or his enemies.

After this, putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that voyage allured unto him a Nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requital of his services) whom finding shortly, as false to himself as he had been to his own Uncle, he was fain to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greeks at liberty, appeared not so plain, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the love of that valiant Nation, he made at the last an Expedition into Greece itself: where having first free some little Islands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised to great an expectation of finishing the long-desired work, that Cratespolis, the Widow of Alexander, Polysperchons Son, gave up into his hands, the Towns of Sycon and Corinth.

Ptolomy had conceived a vain belief, that the Greeks, emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart and rise up in arms; whereby with little labour their liberty might be gotten; and he be acknowledged as Author of this immortal benefit. But long servitude had well-near extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many like attempts to recover freedom, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stir in pursuit thereof; but sat idly still, as wishing it to fall into their mouths.

The Macedonians, about these times, began to fortify their Town with walls; trusting no longer in their virtue (for both it, and the discipline that upheld it, were too much impaired) that had been a wall to their Town and Territory.

The Athenians were become as humble servants, as they had been in times past insolent Masters: erecting as many statues in honor of Demetrius Phalerens, as there were days in the Year. This Demetrius was now their Governor; and he governed them with much moderation: but, in spite of their hearts, as being set over them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principal Cities, it is easy to gather, how the rest of the Country stood affected. Ptolomy could not get them to set their helping-hands to their own good, and to furnish him with the promised supplies of money and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thralldom; as judging the commodity that would arise by annexing them to his party, a matter of more weight than the loss that Cassander should receive thereby, who could hardly retain them, if once Antigonus took the work in hand. But when he found such difficulty in the business, he changed his purpose: And renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sycon and Corinth in his own possession.

Before the coming of Ptolomy into Greece, Cassander had been held occupied with very much work. For (besides his pains taken in Wars among barbarous Princes) he found means to allure unto himself the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellespont: making his own advantage of their discontentments. By the like skilful practice he freed himself from a greater danger, and made those murderers which he had committed seem the less odious, by teaching his enemies to do the like. Old Polysperchon, that had made so great a stir in the reign of Arideus, did after the death of Roxane and her child, enter again upon the Stage: leading in his hand another Son of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Barine the daughter of Artabazus Persian; but had been left esteemed than the Son of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the favour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did bear unto Roxane. At this time the death of his Brother had moved such compassion, and regard of his being Alexanders only living child, had procured unto him such good will, that the demand which Polysperchon made in his behalf, was deemed very just and honorable. There were indeed more hearts than hands, that joyed with this young Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him that least ought, had not been most false. Cassander had raised an Army to withstand his entry into Macedonia; but little trust could he repose in that Army, whose wishes he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he affailed Polyperchon himself with gifts and promises; wherewith at length he prevailed so far, that the old Villain was contented to murder his Pupil; chusing rather with many curses and foul dishonor, to take the offered Lordship of Poloponnesus, and Commander of an Army; than to purchase a noble fame with dangerous travel, in maintaining his faith, unto both his dead and living Sovereigns.

Antigonus had not all this while been asleep; though his losses were hitherto the chief witnesses of his having been a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present to retain his own: and therefore took order for the recovery of those places which Ptolomy had taken pains to win. As for the rest, it no way grieved him to see Cassander incur the general hatred of men, by committing those murders of which the profit was like to redound unto him that was the most powerful, or to see Polyperchon and Ptolomy sweat in a busie War against Cassander. If they would have continued their quarrels, he could well have afforded them leisure, and have thought the time well spent in beholding their contentions. For he was thoroughly perswaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vain with long strife, his Armies and Treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all under. According to these haughty conceits, he demeaned himself among his followers; looking big upon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them to revolt from him: but it was no great loss to be forsaken by those that looked with envious eyes upon that fortune whereon their own should have depended. Against this envy of his men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedy, such as was like to give him a goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra Sister unto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes: whom he had a great desire to take to Wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howsoever the discovered much unwillingness thereunto, yet was she in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for fear of being enforced. But it was not his purpose to get her by compulsive means: either because his fancy, being an old man, was not over-vivacious; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could have made small use of her, by doing such apparent wrong. She had been married unto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death she came to her Brother in Asia; hoping belike to find a new Husband in his Camp. But neither any of those brave Captains, that were, in times following so hot in love with her, durst then aspire unto her marriage: nor did her Brother, full of other cares, trouble himself with providing her of an Husband. She therefore, being a lusty Widow, suffered her blood so far to prevail against her honor, that she supplied the want of an Husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a jest: saying, That she was his Sister, and must be allowed this liberty, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death the Empire lay in a manner void, and the portion due to her therein grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had been: then did many seek to obtain her, while the her self desired only a proper man, with whom she might lead a merry life. To this purpose did she invite Leontius unto her; who made great haste, but was cut off by death ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, she had her choice of all the great Commanders, Antigonus, Ptolomy, Lysimachus and Cassander, being all her earnest Wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had Wives already; Ptolomy had many Wives, and many Concubines whom he respected as much as his Wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kind. This hindered not his suit: peradventure it advanced it, by giving to Cleopatra some hope of mutual toleration. To him therefore the bequeathed her self, and was taking her journey from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputy in that City, made her to stay, until his Masters further pleasure should be known. Antigonus had now a Wolf by the ears: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her go. She would not be his Wife; he had no honest pretence to force her; and to keep her prisoner, had been the way, by which he might have incurred a general hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Lady less respected than Alexanders own Sister) did well testify. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enjoy the commodity of so fair a title to the Kingdom, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Governor of Sardes, willing him in any case to do it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certain women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as mischievous conspirers against the life of that good Lady. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least in his own opinion:

opinion: but the world was less foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murder was detected, we need not ask: for seldom is that bloody crime unrevealed, and never so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought upon nothing less than the execution of Gods justice, due unto the cruelty of these powerful, but mercilefs Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, upon so wicked foundations of innocent blood, were soon after cast down, overwhelming themselves or their children, with the ruines, as the sequel will declare.

How Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, gave liberty to Athens, expelling the Garrisons of Cassander out of those parts. The immoderate honor decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

None being left alive that had any title to the Kingdom; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superior, should freely profess themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill-beseemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbear it: neither seemed it convenient in the judgement of Antigonus, to crown his last action with such a title, as if he had attained unto greatness by that foul murder, the infamy whereof he was careful how to discharge from his own head. He purposed therefore to undertake a plausible enterprize, even the liberty of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honor as would not only drown all bad reports, but make him be thought equal to any name of Royalty, whereof in seeming modesty, he was not covetous. To this purpose he delivered a strong Army, with a Navy of two hundred and fifty sail, and fifty thousand talents of silver, unto Demetrius his son: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceed, in setting all the Country free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance he entered the Haven; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomy, Cassanders good friend, had been arrived. But when it was known, both who he was, and what was the cause of his coming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations: Demetrius Pha- lerus forsook the Town, and withdrew himself to Thebes under safe conduct; only the Garrison in Minichia strove to make good that piece, which after a while was won upon them by force. During the siege of Minichia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the City to liberty.

I think it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seem no better than meer trifles: for even by trifles are the qualities of great personages well disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly strain themselves, to the observance of general commended rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their own Natures. The Lady Cratespolis lay in Patras, and had a great desire to see Demetrius; hoping, belike, that she might by his means better her estate, and recover her Towns of Sicyon and Corinth, detained by Ptolomy; to whose Lieutenant in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered money for the surrender of them. Yet the only business pretended was love. He being advertised hereof, left his forces in the Country of Megara, and taking a company of his lightest armed, for guard of his person, made a long journey to meet with her. This troop also he caused to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might see her when she came. As closely as the business was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few men might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any terms of reason, by taking his dear son prisoner. Their project fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddenly upon him, that he had no better shift, than to muffle himself in an old cloak, and creep away disguised; leaving them to ransack his Tent. There was in this Prince a strangely odd of conditions; especially an extreme dissoluteness in wanton pleasures, and a painful industry in matters of War. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in devising Engines of War, and curious in working them with his own hands. He knew better how to reform his bad fortune, than how to rule his good. For adversity made his valour more active: prosperity puffed him with over-weening, wherein he thought that he might do what he listed. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her Wheel, till she had wound up the thred of his life.

in such manner as followeth to be shewed. Returning to his Camp, and finishing his business at Megara; he resolv'd no longer to attend the issue of a siege, to assail Munychia by force, that so he might accomplish the liberty of Athens: which, until it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the City. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through help of their Engines that scoured the walls, prevailed upon the resolution of those that lay within it, and won the place in two days. The walls, and all the defences of that piece against the City, were levelled with the ground, and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom it was given their liberty, with promise to aid them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lower, than of any other victory gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industry. For the Athenians, having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make up that defect with their tongues: converting to base flattery, that eloquence of theirs which the virtues of their Ancestors had suited unto more many arguments.

They decreed unto Antigonus and Demetrius the name of Kings; they consecrated the place in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entered their City, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius, the almighty; they called them by the names of the gods their Saviours, ordaining that every year, there should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadors, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods; like as were they, whom they sent unto the Oracle of Jupiter, or Apollo.

It were a frivolous diligence to rehearse all their flatteries, these being so gross. Hereby they not only corrupted the young Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would have pleased the old man, to be of no use. For he could not handomely take upon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians, unless he would seem to approve their vanity, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was he so tickled with this their fine handling him, that when their Theori or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieve them with Corn and Timber to build ships; he gave them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather so weak is great power in resisting the assaults of flattery.

§. XI.

The great victory of Demetrius against Ptolemy in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius took upon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

From this glorious work, Antigonus called away Demetrius, unto a business of greater difficulty; meaning to employ his service against Ptolemy, in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willing to establish a general Council, that should treat of matters concerning the common good of the Country. About the same time Antigonus withdrew his own Garrison out of Ambror, committing their liberty entire, into the peoples hands; whereby it might appear, that as he would not permit any other to oppress the Greeks, so would he be far from doing it himself. This was enough to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased Friends: it followed, that he should convert his forces, to the winning of ground upon his Enemies.

A pitiful Tragedy had lately hapned in Cyprus, through the indifferency of Menelaus, Ptolemies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Isle. Nicoles, King of Paphos, was entered into some practice with Antigonus; yet not so far that he thought himself past excuse; by which confidence, he was perhaps the more easily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the false-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was sent thither: who surrounding Nicoles his house with Souldiers, required, in Ptolemies name, to have him yielded to the death. Nicoles offered to clear himself; but Menelaus told him, that dye he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessity caused the unhappy King to rid himself of life: and his death struck such an impression into his wife, that she not only slew herself, but persuaded the wives of her husbands brethren to do the like. Also those brethren of Nicoles, unto whom Ptolemy had intended no ill, being amazed with the suddenness of this calamity, did shut up the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

Whatsoever the crime objected was; Nicoles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Menelaus deserved the blame, blame, for his rigorous proceeding; yet it is to be thought, that much dislike fell also upon Ptolemy: as men that are grieved, cast an ill affection even upon those that gave the furthest removed occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolemy was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing against him, either because they had small strength or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themselves have the rule of their own Country. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Army, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driven to save himself within the walls of Salamis, where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour, he had no likelihood to make good the place, much less to retain possession of the whole Island. His greatest help at the present was the fidelity of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good usage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keep from returning to him, with the first opportunity. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Egypt, which was enough to keep them faithful. Yet could not this their resolution have stood long against the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of battery, if Ptolemy had not hastied to the rescue.

Ptolemy brought with him a hundreded and forty Gallies, besides two hundreded Ships of burden, for transporting his Army and Carriages. This Fleet made a terrible shew, when it was described afar; though more than half of it was unfit for service in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadful, Ptolemy sent unto Demetrius a threatening message: willing him to be gone, unless he would be overwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this young gallant repaid him with words of as much bravery, promising to let him escape upon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Sydon and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more than one hundreded and eighteen Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolemy; better stored with weapons fit for that service; and very well furnished with Engines in the prow, to beat upon the enemy. Nevertheless he stood in great doubt of three-score Gallies that lay in the Haven of Salamis, left Menelaus with them should set up on his back: in which case, it was very likely that all would go very ill with him. Against this mischief, he bestowed ten of his own Gallies in the mouth of that Haven, to keep Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his horsemen on the shore, to give what assistance they could, he with the rest of the Fleet, puts to Sea against Ptolemy.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtful success. The generals were not ranged opposite one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his own Fleet. Each of them prevailed against the Squadron wherewith he encountered; but the success of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victory in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally drove all to betake themselves unto speedy flight. As for Ptolemy, he was fain to leave his advantage upon the enemy in one part of the fight, that he might relieve and animate those of his own which needed him in another: wherein he found his loss over-great to be repaired, by contending any longer against the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to save himself, in hope of better event, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battle no unusual accident; yet was the victory greater than could have been expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great skill in Seafervice, which the Greeks and Phenicians that were with Demetrius, had above those which followed Ptolemy: partly, the good furniture of the Ships, wherein consisted no less, than in the quality of those with whom they were manned. Further, we may reasonably judge, that the two hundreded ships of burthen, carrying the strength of Ptolemies Army, did not more encourage his own men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight, than breed in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight they fell off, and stood aloof. For thought it were fitting that they should so do; yet a multitude, prepossessed with vain conceits, will commonly apprehend very slight occasions to think themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation that Menelaus, issuing with his fleet out of Salamis should charge the enemy in the stern, was utterly frustrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to bar up the mouth of the Haven: which they manfully performed, as great necessity required.

Such disappointment of expectation doth much abate the courage of men in fight: especially of the assailants: whereas on the contrary, they find that some part of their fears fears vain, do easily gather hopeful spirits, and conceive an opinion of their own ability, to do more than they thought upon, out of their not suffering the harm that they had imagined.

Whatsoever the causes of this victory were, the fruit was very great. For Pholomy had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest of his fleet was either taken or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer strive against the violence of fortune; but yielded up all that he held in Cyprus, together with his Army, consisting of twelve thousand foot, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Haven of Salamis. The same dejection of spirit was found in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had served the Egyptian by Land; none of them repining any more confidence in Pholomy, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whose Army they now increased.

It was generally believed, that much more depended on the event of this fight, than the Isle of Cyprus, for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking every day a year, till he were advertised of the issue. In this mood Aristodemus found him, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honored with the Message of these good news. Aristodemus had be thought himself of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his joyful errand: He caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; he himself landed in a Cockboat, which he sent immediately back to the ship; and so all alone he went forward, looking very sadly, that no part of his tidings might appear in his countenance. Report of his arrival (for it was not known where he had been) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after messenger to meet him on the way, and bring speedy word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a look, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be won from this demure Gentleman.

Thus marched he fair and softly forward with a great throng at his heels (that served well to let out his Pageant) until he came in sight of Antigonus, who could not contain himself, but went down to meet him at the Gate, and hear the news. Then did Aristodemus, upon the sudden, with a high voice salute Antigonus by the name of King; uttering the greatness of the victory (with as much pomp, as before he had covered it, with silence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loud acclamations, gave that name of King, both to Antigonus and his son Demetrius. Antigonus, in requital of the long suspense, wherein Aristodemus had held him, said, That it should also be long ere he received his reward. But the Title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his head, he could not with a fairer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his son.

When it was once noised abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves Kings; it was not long ere their fellows were ready to follow the good example. Pholomy his friends would by no means endure, that their Lord should be thought a man dejected for the loss of a fleet; therefore they flattered him also King. Lysimachus in Thrace had boldness enough to put the Diadem about his own head. Seleucus had, before this time, among the barbarous people, taken upon him as King: but now he used the stile indifferently, as well among the Greeks and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himself contented with his own name: whereby, howsoever he might shadow his pride, he no way lessened the fame of his cruelty against his Masters house. But the name which he forbore, his sons after him were bold to usurp, though with ill success, as will appear when they shall enter upon the Stage, whereon these old Tragedians, under new habits, as no longer now the same persons, begin to play their parts, with bigger looks, and more boistrous actions, not with greater grace and judgement, than in the Scenes already past.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Wars between the Kings of Egypt, Asia, Macedon, Thrace, and others; untill all Alexanders Princes were confumed.

§. I.

The Expedition of Antigonus against Egypt, with ill success.

ALL the rest of these Kings had taken that name upon them, in imitation of Antigonus himself, as be seeming his greatness: which was such as gave him hope to swallow them up, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his own strength, he resolved to single out Pholomy, and make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose he prepared an Army of eighteen thousand foot, and eight thousand Horse, with fourscore and three Elephants: as likewise a fleet of an hundred and fifty Gallies, and a hundred ships of burthen. The Land forces he commanded in person: of the Navy Demetrius was Admiral.

When all was ready for the journey, the Sea-men advised him to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the setting of the Pleades. But his hasty desire to prevent all preparations for resistance that Pholomy should make, rejected this counsel; and imputing it rather to their fear than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Town which he had built in Syria, and called after his own name, that was soon changed into Seleucia, by his mortal enemy) and came to Gaza, where he met with his Fleet. The nearer that he drew to Egypt, the more haste he made: thinking by celerity to prevail more than by his great power. He caused his Souldiers to carry ten dayes provision of Victuals; and had many Camels laden with all necessities for passing the Deserts, over which he marched with no small toil, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Gassius, which is near adjoining to Nilus, he saw his Fleet riding at Anchor, not far from the shore, in ill case, and many Ships wanting. It had been forely beaten with foul weather, wherein some were lost, others driven back to Gaza, or scattered elsewhere into such creeks as they could recover: Demetrius himself, with the best and (strongest Vessels, did so long bear it up against the winde, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremity, he and all his must have perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom these over-wearied, thirsty and Sea-beaten Souldiers received relief. After these painful travels, there followed a War no less painful than to little purpose; for Pholomy had so fortified all the passages upon the River of Nilus, as he assured himself either to end the war there, or if his guards should happen to be forced, yet could it not be done but so much to the weakening of the Assailants, as he should afterward, with a second Army (which he held entire) entertain the Invader upon advantage enough. All that Antigonus sought, was to come to blows speedily: Pholomy on the contrary, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gave him water enough, but wood he had none to warm it: and while Antigonus assaulted the Rampiers, raised upon the River, in vain, Pholomy played the faith of his Souldiers, with good success; for, with great gifts, and greater promises, he ferried them over so fast, as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments upon the passages next the enemy, and in the mean while taken a resolution to return, Pholomy had turned him out of Egypt ill attended.

Some of them indeed he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the same ill success that Perdicus had formerly done, when he invaded Egypt, had he not readily removed his Army further off, from the noise of their entertainment, that had already been won from him. To prevent therefore as well the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a forced retreat, he secretly practised the advice of his Council, upon whom the burthen must be laid of his entrance, and leaving Egypt.

It

It is indeed less prejudicial in such like cases, that errors, dishonours, and losses, be laid on Counsellors and Captains, than on Kings; on the Directed, than on the Director: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is far more precious than that of a Vassal. Charles the fifth, as many other Princes have done, laid the loss and dishonour he received in the invasion of France, by the way of Provence, to Antony de Leva, whether justly or no, I know not; but howsoever, all the Historians of that time agree, that the sorrow thereof cost that brave Captain his life. Certainly to give any violent advice in doubtful enterprises, is rather a testimony of love, than of wisdom, in the giver; for the ill success is always cast upon the Council, the good never wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it. Yet I have sometime known it, that great Commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, have not only been disswaded, but held, in a kind, by strong hand, from hazarding their own persons, and yet have those kind of Mutiners never been called to a Marshals Court.

§. II.

How the City of Rhodes was besieged by Demetrius.

THis departure of Antigonus, left behind it many dead Carcasses, and a great deal of joy in Egypt. Ptolomy held a solemn Feast, and sent Messengers abroad, laden with glad news, to Seleucus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, his Confederates: strongly encouraging all that side, with the report of this his late felicity, though it appeared but in a defensive War. Antigonus on the contrary, flattered himself with another interpretation, calling the joys of his enemies for witnesses of his own greatness, seeing they arose but from so little things: his enemies being but bare saviors by the last bargain, and himself, as he supposed, having lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retreat. Howsoever it were, yet he meant to follow his affairs henceforth in another fashion; for that which he could not cleave asunder by great blows, he purposed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to fell the Tree it self with the more facility. To effect which, he resolved (leaving the great ones to grow a while) to root up the Dependents of his Enemies: Dependents, whom the fore-named Confederates should be forced either to relieve, or to lose; and hereby he doubted not to draw them into the field, where the advantage of power, and of all other warlike provision promised him victory.

At this time the City of Rhodes was very mighty, being well governed, and having long held it self in good Neutrality; it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and therein a great deal of riches to it self; to maintain which, and to encrease it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed Ships, by which it not only beat off all Pyrates and petty Thieves, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the Neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacy.

In this so dangerous a time (in which they must either refuse all that sought them, and so stand friendless and apart; or joyn themselves to some one, and thereby forego the peace, by which their greatness had grown) their affections carried them to the Egyptians: both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatness, and neighbourhood was fearful unto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages more apparent, gave argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himself against them by petty injuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other grievances, while he made a more weighty preparation, to pursue the War against them openly and strongly. All things soon after ordered according to the greatness of the enterprise, he employed his Son Demetrius against them in their own Island, who brought such terror upon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their assistance and service against whomsoever. Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perwaded by fear, and not by love; raised his demands to an intollerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be delivered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many ships of War as himself pleased. These conditions, more properly to be imposed upon a State already conquered, than on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained assistance, restored unto the Rhodians their lost courage, and made them resolve to defend their liberty to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bond-men, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselves fellow-slaves with them.

Demetrius having refused the fair conditions

§. III.

How Demetrius prevailed in Greece. Cassander desires peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtain it. Great preparations of War against Antigonus.

Demetrius coming with a strong Fleet and Army into Greece, quickly drave Cassander out of Attica; and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the straits of Thermopylae. Herein his reputation did much avail him; which was so great, that six thousand of his enemies Souldiers revolted unto him. So, partly by the greatness of his name, partly by force, he recovered in short space all that Cassander held in those straits, and giving liberty unto the people, he bestowed upon the Athenians those pieces, which had been fortified against them, to block them up. Then went he into Peloponnesus, where he found the like or more easy success: for he suddenly took Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Country, bestowing liberty upon such as needed it. The Town of Sicyon he translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old seat into another place, and called it after his own name, Demetrius. This done, he betook himself to his pleasure. At the Isthmian games he caused himself to be proclaimed Captain General of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he despised all others, making it a matter of jest, that any, save himself or his father, should usurp the Name of King. But in his behaviour he was so far unlike to a King, that in all the time of his leisure, he deserved none other name than of a drunken Paliard. Yet were the Athenians as ready as ever to devise new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, That whatsoever King Demetrius should command, ought to be held sacred with the gods, and just with men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great fear, lest the war should fall heavily upon him in Macedon: which to avoid, he knew no better way than to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpose, he sent Embassadors; but had no better answer from Antigonus, than that he should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him look about him, and labour hard in soliciting his friends, both to assist him, and take heed to themselves; neither found he them slow in apprehending the common danger: for Lysimachus knew that tions offered (as the Rhodians the fearful ones propounded unto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carry the place in fury, he set in hand with his Engines of battery; in the invention and use of which, he did never think himself a greater Artisan, than in this War. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults given them for a whole year, after many brave sallies out of the Town, and the famine which they endured within the Town, which had proved far more extream, if Ptolomy had not with many hazards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gave over the siege; a hundred hostages they gave him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and Officers of the City.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the usual policy of War, and State: for while with the flower of all his Fathers forces he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the War as in former times, by practice and surprise, but by a strong and well compounded Army, which he himself lead as far as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed and endangered Athen it self. On the other side (though with less success) did Polyperchon invade Peloponnesus. These dangerous undertakings upon Greece, advised the Athenians and Etolians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and advised Demetrius rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten by setting all Greece at liberty.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Island, than that the Rhodians erected Statues in honour of Lysimachus, and Cassander; but for Ptolomy, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most relief, they consulted with the Oracle of Jupiter, whether it were not lawful to call him a god. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hammon, gave the same fair answer for Ptolomy, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Master; for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Army at his heels, so was Ptolomy at this time Lord of the soil: and yet was this a far more cleanly creation than that done by the Athenians, who deified Antigonus and Demetrius by decree of the people. A mad age it was, when so many of Alexanders Captains could not content themselves with the style of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soon be Master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolemy and Seleucus ignorant of that which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himself in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joint-forces they should all together set upon the common Enemy.

Hereof Antigonus had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That he would as easily scatter them, as a flock of birds are driven away with a stone. With these conceits he pleased himself, and no way hindered the proceedings of his Enemy. He lay at that time in his Town of Antigonía (a name that it must shortly lose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glory. But thither was brought unto him the tumultuous news of Lysimachus his victories about Hellepont. For Cassander had committed unto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to pass over into Asia, while he himself with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellepont, began to make hot war upon the subjects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to joyn with him by fair means: winning others by force, and wasting the Country round about.

To repress this unexpected boldness, Antigonus made hasty journeys, and came soon enough to recover his losses, but not strong enough to drive Lysimachus home, or compel him to come to battle. Lysimachus waited for the coming of Seleucus; keeping himself the whilest from necessity of fighting. But Babylon was far off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to be soon in a readiness. The Winter also did hinder his journey: which informed them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrel in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspense, and bred much expectation. Yet might all have come to nothing, had not Antigonus been so forward, that he refused to yield upon any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew near with a mighty Army of his own (for he had gathered strength in that long time of leisure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great aid from Ptolemy, that was joyned with his forces.

To help in this needful case, Demetrius was called over into Asia by his Fathers letters: which he readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, upon reasonable terms: to the end he might not be driven to leave any part of his Army for defence of the Country; and that his journey might be without any such blemish of reputation, as if he had abandoned his Dependents: for one Article of the Peace was, that all the Cities of Greece should be at liberty. Cassander was glad to be so rid of an Enemy that was too strong for him. Yet would this league have done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise than they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred unto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, every one found means to clear himself of all incumbrances else-where, to the end that each of them might freely apply himself to the tryal of the main controversie in Asia.

§. IV.

How Antigonus was slain in a great battel at Ipsus, near unto Ephesus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

Seleucus, with his Son Antiochus, joyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Army, which was (all considered) not inferior to that of the Enemy. In greatness of name (that helpeth much in all Wars, but especially in the Civil) they were rather unanswerable than unequal to their adversaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them under with a mastering spirit, and had been reputed a King indeed, when the rest were held but Usurpers of the Title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brave Commander, having given proof of his worth in many great services of all kinds, and enriched the art of War with many inventions, which even his enemies, and particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had some times flattered Antigonus, and fearfully stolen away from him to save his life, with young Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this journey; and Lysimachus, that had lived long in a corner, hardly keeping his own from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation of that which was yielded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captains under Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough to receive any benefit that Fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardy and well exercised: many of them having served under Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space space of two and twenty years had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections, the followers of Seleucus were easily perswaded, that in this battel they must either get the upper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged unto the Confederate Princes; whereas Antigonus his men could discern no other necessity of fighting, than the obstinate quality of their Lord, that needs would be Master of all. Antigonus had about threecore and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and threecore and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were six thousand short of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the odds of five hundred; of Elephants they had four hundred, and an hundred and twenty armed Chariots of War: which helps, though they little had availed the Persians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captain.

Antigonus himself, either troubled with the unexpected greatness of his enemies forces, or prefiging little good like to ensue, grew very penive, communing much in private with his Son whom he commended to the Army as his Successor: whereas in former times he had never been so jocund, as towards the hour of battel, nor had been accustomed to make his Son, or any other private to his counsel, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad luck, either foregoing the fight, or afterwards devised, I hold it needless to recount. Diana of Ephesus dwelt near to the place of battel, a busie goddess in many great fights; and therefore likely to have been thrust into the fable, if any matter neerly resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is easie to believe, that these two so gallant Armies, containing well near all the strength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by such worthy Commanders, and whom the issue thereof did highly concern. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an easie loss in regard of the much variety, wherewith every story aboundeth in this kind. The most memorable things in the battel, were these: Demetrius with his best force of Horse, charged valiantly upon young Antiochus; whom when he had broken, and put to flight, he was so transported with the heat of his good success, that he never gave over his pursuit, but left his Father naked, and lost thereby both him, and the victory. For when Seleucus perceived this advantage, he interposed his Elephants, between Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus; and with many troops of horse offering to break upon the enemies battel, wherefoever it lay most open, he did so terrifie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather chose to revolt from their Lord, whilest they were fairly invited, than to sustain the fury of so dangerous an impression. This cowardize, or rather Treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all into flight; exposing their General to the last end of his destinies. Antigonus was then fourcore years old, very fat and unweildy, so that he was unapt for flight, if his high spirit could have entertained any thought thereof. He had about him some of his most trusty followers, and as many others as he could hold together. When one that perceived a great troop making towards his person, told him, Sir King, your company means to charge you; He answered, Well may they; for who defends me? but anon Demetrius will relieve us. Thus expecting to the very last, that his Son should come to his rescue, he received so many Darts into his body, as took away his lately ambitious, but then fearfull hopes, together with his troublesome life.

His great ability in matter of Arms, together with his unsatiable desire of Empire, have sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loved by his friends; as one that could not moderate his Fortune, but used insolence towards all alike, as if it had been some vertue neerest representing a Kingly Majesty. This was the cause that to many of his followers revolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Army forsook him in his last necessity. For those Kings and Princes that call all the carefulle endeavours of their Vassals, only duty and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest services: shall find themselves upon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is love only that stays by adversity) not only the most friendless, but even the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he lived; in part he left it to be verified upon his Son.

§. V.

How Demetrius, forsaken by the Athenians after his overthrow, was reconciled to Seleucus and Ptolemy, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entering into quarrels.

FOR Demetrius, at his return from the idle pursuit of young Antiochus, finding all quite lost, was glad to save himself, with four thousand horse, and five thousand foot, by a speedy retreat unto Ephesus, whence he made great haste unto Athens, as to the place, that for his sake would suffer any extremity. But whilest he was in the midst of his course thither, the Athenian Embassadors met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their City. These were Embassadors, not Theori, or Consulters with the Oracle. It was a shameful ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his misery, with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamity more afflict the unfortunate Prince, than to see his adversity despised by those whom he had thought his surest Friends. Yet was he fain to give good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Haven, of which he now stood in great need; and therefore was fain to speak them fair, that sometimes had grossly flattered him. But he shall live to teach them their old language, and speak unto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he sailed to the Isthmus, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrisons were every where broken up; the Souldiers having betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a small Army and Fleet, without money or means wherewith to sustain him and his followers any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerors, and those few places which as yet held for him (having not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieve: for to put himself into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power; and to inclose himself in any of them, how strong soever, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeed to bury himself and his estate: He therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had sweetest briers, fell upon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdom, whereof he gave all the spoil that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his own losses having been too great to be repayed again by small prizes.

In the mean while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselves, in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords: wherein Seleucus had a notable advantage by being present, and Master of the field; for neither Ptolemy nor Cassander were at the overthrow given, having only sent certain troops to re-inforce the Army which Seleucus led, who took hold of a part of Asia the less, and all Syria, being no otherwise divided from his own Territory, than by the River of Euphrates. For there had not any order been taken by the Confederates, for the division of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that War, which they made only in their own common defence. It was therefore lawful for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that he could of the Victory, at which nevertheless others did repine; and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the over-greatness of Seleucus brought no less danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted upon the same reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined; for he read it in the Law universal of Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendships on all sides, and cure themselves of all unprofitable passion: the hatred of each to other, and their loves being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found so far too light, as Seleucus, who had to day slain Antigonus his Father, and driven Demetrius the Son out of Asia, sought to morrow how to match himself with Stratonica, Demetrius his Daughter; and so by Demetrius to serve his turn against Lysimachus.

The story of this Stratonica, with whom young Antigonus, the Son of Seleucus fell so passionately in love, and so distempered, as Seleucus his Father, to save his Sons life, gave her (though she were his Wife) unto him; and how his passion was discovered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance between Seleucus and Demetrius; between Ptolemy and Lysimachus; between Demetrius and Cassander; between Demetrius and Ptolemy, though for the present it brought him again into the rank of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages between Christian Kings have done in latter times, namely between the Austrians, the Arragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither have the Leagues of those elder times been found more faithfull, than those of the same latter times have been, as in the stories of Charles the Eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of Francis the First, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Milan, and others, the Reader may observe: between whom from the year of our Lord, One thousand four hundred ninety and five, when Charles the Eighth undertook the Conquest of Naples, to the year One thousand five hundred fifty and eight, when Henry the Second died; the Histories of those times tell us, that all the bonds, either by the Bed, or by the Book, either by Weddings or Sacramental Oaths, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reap this profit by giving his Daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recovered Sicilia from Plisarchus, the Brother of Cassander, who had gotten it as his share in the division of Antigonus his possessions: for the Intruder was not strong enough to hold it by his proper forces, from him that entered upon it as a lawful heir; neither would Seleucus lend him any help, as by the Rule of Confederacy he should have done against the common enemy. So Plisarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went unto Cassander; whither Phila, their Sister, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, and keep all quiet; being sent for that purpose by Demetrius her Husband, that was not strong enough to deal with Cassander; and therefore glad to make use of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his own prosperity, he never took notice to the others good. About the same time he took to Wife a Daughter of Ptolemy (plurality of Wives being familiar with these Macedonians, that had learned it in their Eastern Conquests) and so was he by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, than strengthened with two friends; for neither of them wished him any good, otherwise than might seem to advance their own ambitious desires.

Seleucus and Ptolemy could both of them have been contented better, that Demetrius, with help of their countenance, should seek his fortune somewhat farther off, than settle his estate under their noses. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himself: and Ptolemy had a great appetite (which yet he concealed awhile) to the Isle of Cyprus. Now whether it were so, that Seleucus would faine have let his new Father-in-law upon the neck of Lysimachus; or whether he were indeed greedy of the bargain; he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchase of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not hearken, but meant to keep as much Land as he could, having already found in Cilicia twelve thousand talents of his Fathers Treasure, that would serve him to make sport a while. This refusal so displeased Seleucus, that in angry terms he demanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be surrendered unto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battle. Instead of giving them up, Demetrius took present order to have them better manned; and spake it stoutly, That were he overcome a thousand times, yet would he not hire Seleucus to become his Son-in-law. In this quarrel Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would break friendship with his Father-in-law for two Towns, from whom he had already taken more than well he knew how to govern. But the fire consumed it self in words, which had it fastned upon arms, like it is that the weaker should have found friends out of envy to the stronger.

§. VI.

How Demetrius won the City of Athens, and prevailed in Greece, but lost in Asia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Cassander.

IN the mean while, the Athenians not knowing how to use the liberty which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, under the Tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their distempered City was so weakened, that it seemed ill able to keep off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This advantage hastened him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to present himself unto them, in the habit of a revenging fury. He brought against them all the force that he could well spare from other employments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Eastern friends, were unwilling to give impediment to any business, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprise in Athens had ill success; a great part of his Fleet perishing in a tempest. But he soon repaired the loss; and (after some Victories in Peloponnesus, where he won divers Towns that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprise, wasted the Country of Attica, and cut off all relief from the City, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feed the great multitude within it, any long time: for it stood in a barren soil, and wanted now the command of those Islands, and places abroad, from from whence it was wont to be stored with victuals; being also destitute of means to keep such a Navy as might bring in supply, or dare to do any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomy, who (trusting thereby to win the love of Greece) had laden an hundred and fifty ships with Corn, and sent them to relieve the hungry City. But these hundred and fifty were unable to deal with three hundred good fighting-ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore halted them away betimes, as having done enough, in adventuring to come so near that they might be defied. This brake the heart of the people, among whom the famine was so extreme, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Mouse, which dropped down between them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embassadors to yield up the Town, and crave pardon, having so far offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capital offence to propose any motion of peace. Yet were they fain to abolish this Decree, rather because they knew not what else to do, than because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the Victory, did not only forbear to take away the lives of these unthankfull men, which they had submitted unto his mercy; but out of his liberality gave them food, and placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the people. Nevertheless he was grown wiser than to trust them so far as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Havens, and dispose of them at his pleasure; he was ready to lay hold upon the word, and leave a sure Garrison within their Walls, to keep them honest perforce. After this he went into Peloponessus, vanquished the Lacedemonians in two Battels, and was in very fair possibility to take their City: when the dangerous news of Lysimachus and Ptolomy, that prevailed faster upon him elsewhere, than himself did upon his enemies in Greece, called him in all haste. Lysimachus had won many Towns in Asia; Ptolomy had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the City of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children and Mother, that were straitly besieged. Whilest he was bethinking himself which way to turn his face, a notable piece of business offered it self, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soon after him, Philip his eldest Son, whose two younger Brethren, Antipater and Alexander, fought for the Kingdom. In this quarrel Thessalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had married, seemed better affected to Alexander, than to her elder Son: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his own Mother. The odiousness of this fact gave a fair lustre to Alexanders cause: drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in revenge of the Queens death, upon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lysimachus, whose Daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without some foreign aid. For which cause he called in both Pyrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will soon appear in the following Tragedy, of him and his Brother. Their Father Cassander had been one that shifted well for himself, at such time as every man sought how to get somewhat, in the ill-ordered division of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, and a good Soldier: one of more open dealing than were his Companions, but withal more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely have made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, upon some opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditary quarrel, derived from his Father, whom she could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by cruelty that she used against his friends, both alive and dead; as it made him adventure upon shedding the Royall blood: wherewith, when once he had stained his hands, he did not care how far he proceeded in that course of murder. His carefulness to destroy those women and children, whose lives hindered his purpose, argues him to have been rather skilfull in matters of Arms, than a valiant man: such cruelty being a true mark of cowardize, which fears a far off the dangers, that may quietly pass away: and seeks to avoid them by base and wicked means, as never thinking it self safe enough, until there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may be said, that they had well deserved the bloody end which over-took them; yet ill-beseemed it Cassander to do the Office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no Law of men, deserved to dye for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the divine Justice brought swords upon his wife and children, that well revenged the cruelty of this bloody man, by destroying his whole house as he had done his Masters.

of Pyrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Cassanders Children. Demetrius gets the Kingdom of Macedon; prevails in War against the Greeks; loseth reputation in his War against Pyrhus, and in his Civil Government, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrhus and Lysimachus invade him, his Army yields to Pyrhus, who shares the Kingdom of Macedon with Lysimachus.

Pyrhus, the Son of that unfortunate Prince Excides, which perished in War against Cassander, was hardly preserved, being a suckling Infant, from the fury of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosterers had conveyed him to Glaucias King of Ilyria; the deadly hatred of Cassander would have bought his life with the price of two hundred Talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his heir. Glaucias was so far from betraying Pyrhus, that he restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdom, when he was but twelve years of age. Within the compass of six years, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, drove him out of his Kingdom, and left him to try the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his Sister) became his Page, followed him a while in his Wars, was with him in the great Battel of Issus, whence he fled with him to Ephesus; and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomy. In Egypt he so behaved himself, that he got the favour of Berenice, Ptolomys principal Wife; so that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon sent home, with money and men, into Epirus: more beholding now to Ptolomy, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdom of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that business between the Children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders Sons, was so far too weak for Pyrhus, that he had no desire to attend the coming of Demetrius, but made an hasty agreement, and divided the Kingdom with his younger Brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aid of Pyrhus so troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrhus had the audacity to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Country, as the reward of his pains: leaving the two Brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessity enforced the Brethren to compulsion: but their composition would not satisfy Demetrius, who took the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a fool to come so far with an Army, and finde no work for it. This was a frivolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to do as Pyrhus had done; and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wife course, to remove this over-diligent friend, by murdering him upon some advantage. Thus Demetrius reported the story, and it might be true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, believed it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himself was feasted and slain by Demetrius; who took his part of the Kingdom, as a reward of the murder; excusing the fact so well, by telling his own danger, and what a naughty man Cassander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was busied in War with a King of the wild Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to seek peace of Demetrius, which to obtain, he caused the remainder of Macedon to be given up; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his Son-in-law. At this ill bargain Antipater grievously stormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed; until his Father-in-law, to save the labour of making many excuses, took away his troublesome life. Thus in haste, with a kind of neglect, and as it were to avoid molestation, were slain the Children of Cassander: of Cassander that had slain his own Masters Children, in a wife course of policy, with careful meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his own house, that fell down upon his grave, ere the earth on it was thoroughly settled.

It might be thought, that such an access of Dominion, added much to the greatness of Demetrius. But indeed it shewed his infirmity; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of Civil Government: but thought (or shewed by his actions that he thought) the use and fruit of a Kingdom, to be none other, than to do what a King listed. He gave himself over to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those which offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing Justice. He had more skill in getting a Kingdom, than in ruling it: War being his recreation; and Luxury his nature. By long rest (as six years reign is long to him, that knows not how to reign one year) he discovered so much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idleness; and the Souldiers of his vanity. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomy had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his Mother and Children. This afforded him the better leisure of making War in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their City twice in short space, but used his Victory with mercy. Against Lysimachus he would fain have done somewhat (the peace between them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this Journey purchased nothing but enmity. Another expedition he took in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse event. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon, which he had indeed as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdom; he had also made excursions into Thessaly. But there needed not any handsome pretence of quarrel, seeing Demetrius thought himself strong enough to over-run his enemies Country, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the virtue of those, whom they have known raw Novices in that faculty, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinary. Pyrrhus was a Captain, whom latter Ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the rank of Generals, than either Demetrius or any of Alexander's followers. At this time, he misified that part of the Army, which Demetrius led, and fell upon the other half: which he overthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his private valour, shewed in single combat against Pantanchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was utterly beaten. The loss of this Battle did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behaviour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the lively figure of Alexander in his best quality. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeited manner, some of Alexander's graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (said they) none, save Pyrrhus, is like him in deed, in performing the office of a Captain.

These Rumours were not more nourished by the virtue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their own King; whom they began to dislike, not so much in regard of his unprofitable Journey into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Country, and brought home his Army in good case) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparel seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very unmanly; and serving chiefly to be a daily witness, how much he contemned them and their good opinions. Of his Souldiers lives he was reckless: and suffered unwisely this unprincely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. He made a mockery of Justice; and (as it were, to publish unto all his Subjects, how little he esteemed it or them) having by a shew of popularity invited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poor Suters after him in great hope, till coming to a Bridge, he threw all their Writings into a River; pleasing himself, in that he could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses he grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacity, and invading Macedon, had almost won it with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sick in his bed; who recovering health, and taking the field, had such great odds of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he began to have some feeling of the general hate; which to redress, he did not (for he could not) alter his own conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on work in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appear; that is, in a great War. His intent was to invade Asia with a Royal Army: wherein the fortune of one Battle might give him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so he might leave all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Army, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand Horses, with a Navy of five hundred sail, wherein were many ships, far exceeding the greatness of any that had been seen before; yet so swift and useful withal, that the greatness was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomy suspect their own forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, to joyn against this ambitious Son of Antigonus, that was like to prove more dangerous to them all, than ever was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no security for his friends in Europe, what league (soever were of old concluded. Therefore they resolved to begin with him betimes, and each to invade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his own Kingdom. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Army: but while he was yet on the way, news were brought into his Camp, that Pyrrhus had won Berbera. The matter was not over-great: were it not that minds prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold upon small occasions of dislike. All the Camp was in uproar: some wept, others raged, few or none did forbear to utter seditious words, and many desired leave of Demetrius, to go to their own houses, meaning indeed to have gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Army, he thought it the wisest way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their own Country-man, against Pyrrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victory against the Epirot, to recover the love of his followers, in such sort that he might afterwards at leisure deal with the other. But herein his wisdom beguiled him. For the souldiers were as hasty as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others answered, of his person, his armour, and other tokens whereby he might be known; as particularly, by a pair of Goats-horns, that he wore on his crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Divers of them stole away, and ran over into Pyrrhus his Camp: where the news that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get fight of Pyrrhus, they would all salute him King. To try this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and presented himself bare-headed in view of the Camp, whither some were sent before to prepare his welcome. The news of his arrival found a general applause, and every one began to look out, with desire to set eye on him. His face was not so well known as his Helmet; therefore he was admonished to put it on: which done, all came about him, and proffered their service; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius; only some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes, and thist for himself. So Demetrius threw aside his Makers habit, and atyring himself poorly, did fearfully teary away out of his own Camp, deserving well this calamity: whether it were so, that he would not hearken to the good counsel of his friends; or whether his behaviour deprived him of such friends, as would dare to let him hear the unpleasant sound of necessary truth.

Whilest Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdom of Macedon; Lysimachus came upon him very unseasonably, and would needs have half: saying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the War; and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gain. The bargain was quickly made, and the division agreed upon: as of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to work his fellow quite out of all, upon better opportunity.

How Demetrius gathering Forces, enterprised many things with ill success, in Greece and Asia. How he was driven upon Seleucus, and compelled to yield himself. His imprisonment and death.

THE Athenians were as unthankfull to Demetrius in this his adversity, as they had been in former times. For they presently forsook his friendship, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when he went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, under his Son Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had soon gotten an Army, though Phila his Wife (who is highly commended for a wife and virtuous Lady) did poyson her self, upon desperate grief for his misfortune. The first, upon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians: that had well deserved it. He began to lay siege to their Town: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they had made their spokes-man; and taking fair words instead of satisfaction, passed over into Asia, with eleven thousand Souldiers, meaning to try his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Provinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first coming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile upon him. For many good Towns, willingly, or by compulsion, yielded to his obedience. There were also some Captains that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies and treasures. But it was not long ere Agathocles the Son of Lysimachus, came upon him with an Army so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stock against it.

Wherefore,

Wherefore he resolv'd to pass through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Asia; trusting to find a Kingdom somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsel was grievously impeach'd by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his provisions, driving him to take which wayes he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquish'd this troublesome enemy: nevertheless, he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poor titular King, with extremest famine. At length, in passing the river Lycus, so many of Demetrius's men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driven to travel with such speed as might well be called a plain flight. So that with famine, pestilential diseases following famine, and other accidents of war, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest with their Captain, escap'd into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilst Demetrius was occupi'd in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius's errand, to lay claim to the Country; but with vehement and humble Letters he besought his Son-in-law to call to mind their alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These Letters at the first wrought well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himself, when he recovered strength after the battel at Ipsus, he chang'd his purpose, and went against him with an Army.

Many treaties were held between them; of which none took effect, through the jealousy of Seleucus. Therefore meer desperation enforced Demetrius to fight like a mad man, and his furies got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickness took and held him forty days, in which time, a great number of his few men ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding he still held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his coming been discovered by Fugitives, that gave alarm. Finally, when all his Army had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himself, he was compelled by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few forsook him) to yield unto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his own humanity by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he us'd him with as much favour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept under sure guard in a demy-Iland, wherein were goodly Walks, Orchards, and Parks for hunting. He had all that he ask'd royally, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his liberty was reserv'd unto the coming of young Antiochus and Stratonice, out of the high Countreys. In this fort he spent three years, now merrily all the while (as one that living enjoy'd the happiness, which with so much travel and blood-shed, he had sought in vain) and then dyed, leaving to his Son Antigonus, the same which his Father had left unto himself; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Cerinth; his qualities have appear'd in his actions, and the fortune of his House will shew it self hereafter, in times and places convenient.

The death of Ptolemy, of Lyfymachus, and of Seleucus, that was the last of Alexanders Captains: with other occurrences.

ABOUT the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolemy King of Egypt, a virtuous Prince, war-like, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. He had, by many Wives and Concubines, many Children, out of whom he selected Ptolemy Philadelphus, and caus'd him to reign together with himself, two or three years before he died, that so he might confirm him in the Inheritance of the Kingdom. At this, Ptolemy Ceraninus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolemy) was grievously incens'd. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gave him loving entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders' Captains left, Seleucus and Lyfymachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that brave Company. The true ground of their quarrel, was their neer equality or strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lyfymachus had committed upon many of his Nobles, together with his poisoning Agathocles his eldest Son: whose wife and children fled unto Seleucus for aid.

The Macedons, after seven moneths pause, having spent their first heat of admiration, began to hearken so well to Lyfymachus, their natural Country-man, that they forsook Pyrhus, upon none other ground than because because he was an Alien. This they had known well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, that they lightly gave him. Lyfymachus had reigned about five years alone, when the City of Lyfymachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appear'd by events, to have fore-shew'd the fall of his house. His own jealousy, and the instigation of a mother-in-law, caus'd him to poison his son Agathocles: which drew upon him that War, wherein (after the loss of all his fifteen Children that were taken away by divers accidents) he perish'd himself.

Seleucus was encounter'd by Lyfymachus on Asia side, where one battell concluded the war, with Lyfymachus's death. It pleas'd Seleucus more than the victory, that he was the last of all the great Heroes that followed Alexander. For now he seem'd to himself as Lord and Heir of all the conquered World. So he pass'd over into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But here he ended his days, and within seven moneths followed Lyfymachus, and others of his fellows, by a bloody death, being treacherously slain by Ptolemy Ceraninus, whose friend and Patron he had been. Seventy and seven year old he was, when he fought with Lyfymachus, and Lyfymachus was seventy and four. With them ended the generation of old Captains, that had seen the dayes as it were of another World under the Persian: yet was there left one equal to any of them in the Art of War: even Pyrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before; that is now ready to enter into war with the Romans, a more warlike people than Alexander himself did ever encounter. Of which war, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a story more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdoms that were held by Alexanders' Successors, with less (and still decreasing) virtue, than was that, by which they were first purchas'd.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome, and settling of the Eastern Kingdoms

How the Romans enlarg'd their Dominions in Italy, from the death of Tullus Hostilius, to such time as they were assail'd by Pyrrhus.

HOW Rome was founded by Romulus; settled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many (though small) Victories, gathered strength, unto such time as it became the Head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the Reign of Tullus Hostilius: it hath been already noted in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatness beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it self out of Italy, to overwhelm the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it convenient (as in like cases I have done) briefly to set down the growth of this mighty City, in a compendious relation of those many actions, which could not have been deliver'd in the ages, wherein they were severally performed, without much interruption of the History, that was then occupi'd in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when he had reigned two and thirty years, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grand-child to Numa Pompilius by his Daughter, and not much unlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdom of Rome. He wall'd the City about; enlarg'd it with the Hill Aventine, which he enclos'd; built a bridge over Tiberis, and the City of Osia upon the Sea, fifteen miles distant from Rome. Finally having reigned 24 years, he dyed, and by his last Will he left his Children in charge with one Lucumon, the son of Damaratus, a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Helvetia, and dwelt in Tarquinius, by the name of which Town he was afterward call'd Tarquinius. From that City in Helvetia coming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurrences, together with his wife Tanquil prophetic, phesie, he grew a favourite of Annius Martinus; by his Grecian wit humouring the factions of the Roman Court, inſomuch, that after his deceaſe he became not only Protector to the children, but Governour to the City. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centurions of Horſemen: neither was he leſs eminent in war, than in peace: for he prevailed often againſt the Tuſcans, and from his victories, the chiefſt ornaments of triumph took their original. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned 38. years, he was ſlain by the Sons of Annius Martinus, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanquil his wife, perceiving what was done, informed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and ſick, but not dangerously. And withall ſignified unto them, that in the interim of his ſickneſs, one Servius Tullius, whom from his birth he alwayes prophesied to be born to great hopes (the ſon of P. Corniciamus, and Cerſia a well deſcended, but captive woman) brought up in her houſe, and husband unto her daughters, ſhould ſupply her husbands place, in governing the State, untill his recovery: which government, being thus at firſt obtained by cunning, he afterwards uſurped as his right. He firſt ordained Ratements, Subſidies and Valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourſcore-thouſand were muſtered, of which number conſiſted their whole Corporation; and by diſtinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdom in as good ſort, as if it had been a private houſehold. At length, having two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outrageous: and finding alſo that the two ſons of Tarquinius Priſcus, Sextus and Aruns, which had been committed unto his tuition, were of different diſpoſitions, proportionably anſwering to his daughters; he (willing to add water, not oyl, to fire) gave the mild daughter to Sextus the hot-headed ſon, and the violent, to Aruns the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courſes, or by accident, it hapned; the two mild ones being made away, the furious natures were readily joynd in marriage: who ſoon concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claim to the Kingdom. Upon this tumult, Servius Tullius haſtning to the Senate, (where he thought by Authority to have bridled Inſolency) was thrown down the ſtairs, and going home forebruised, was ſlain by the way, when he had reigned 44. years. Then Tullia his daughter, firſt proclaiming her Husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home enforced her Coachman to drive his Chariot over her fathers corps: whereupon the ſtreet had the denomination of Wicked-ſtreet. This Tarquinius, exerciſing cruelty without juſtice, and tyranny without mercy, upon the people and Senators; having tired himſelf and them at home, uſed the ſame rage of treachery upon his borders. He took Oriculum, Stuſſa, Pometia, and the Gabii. The iſſue of beſieging Ardea, a Town eighteen mile diſtant from Rome, was of bad ſuccesſ. In the heat of which War, his Son Sextus Tarquinius violently raviſhed that chaſte Lady Lucretia, his kinsman Collatine wife: who in way of expiation for ſo unchaſte a deed, thought good to waſh out thoſe ſpots of infamy with her own blood; ſo (having firſt bequeathed the revenge unto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatine and Junius Brutus) the kill'd her ſelf: whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his reſolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was depoſed and baniſhed; and fled to Porſenna King of Etruria for ſuccour, in the five and twentieth year of his reign, and the two hundred forty and fourth from the building of their City: in which ſpace Rome had ſcarce gotten poſſeſſion of fifteen miles round about her.

Junius Brutus by the help of Collatine, having expelled Tarquinius, and freed his Country from that heavy yoke of bondage, enforced the people by ſolemn oath, never to admit any government by Kings amongſt them: whereupon they ranſacked their Kings goods, conſecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the government of the State upon Brutus and Collatine. But becauſe the name of King was odious in their ears, they changed the manner of their government, from perpetual to annual, and from a ſingle Government to a double; left perpetual or ſole dominion might be ſome motive to uſurpation; and inſtead of Kings they called them Conſuls, ſignifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwayes mindfull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it ſo hard ſeeling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innovation of State, ſcarce daring to aſſure themſelves of their own ſecurity, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to reſign up his authority, fearing that tyranny would be hereditary, and ſuppoſing that the very name and affinity with the houſe of Tarquinius, favoured already of their condition. In his room was ſubſtitute Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gracious in in the peoples eyes, gave liberty, in matters of controverſie to appeal from the Conſuls to the people, and that he might as well in goods as in perſon, avoid occaſion of ſuſpition, cauſed his own houſe to be pulled down, becauſe it was built in a place defenſible, as if it had been a Citadel. Neither was Brutus any wayes deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples ſafety, as their favour: for having got intelligence, that ſome greener wits, and in the firſt rank his own ſons, were itching after innovations, hoping to reſtore the baniſhed Kings; he cauſed them, publicly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all unpartially to the block.

Hitherto the Romans, having by the unblemiſhed integrity of Brutus, well appeaſed all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter employed their military deſignments againſt Foreigners: firſt, for their liberty; ſecondly, for enlarging of their poſſeſſions; and laſtly, for defending their confederate Provinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, ſituated as it were in the mid-way between Latium and the Tuſcans, having as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minority, could not but give occaſion of offence to her neighbours; untill by main oppoſition, having prevailed againſt her borders, ſhe uſed them as inſtruments, whereby to obtain the reſt.

Their firſt war, in the firſt year of Conſuls, was againſt Porſenna King of Etruria: who being over-perſwaded by Tarquinius lamentation, came to Rome, together with the baniſhed King, and with great forces, to ſeat him again in his Kingdom.

In the firſt conflict, Horatius Cocles, having long time born the main brunt of his enemies on the Bridge over Tiberis, at length, feeling himſelf too faint to ſtand againſt ſo many, cauſed the bridge behind him to be broken down, and with his armour leaping into the River, like a hunted Stag, reſreſhed his hot ſpirits, and returned ſafe to his fellows, with the like reſolution to ſuſtain a new charge. Porſenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Janiculum, which is the very entrance into the City, and found the Victory, in a manner, aſſuredly his own: yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the conſtant reſolution of Mutius ſcevola (who having by error ſlain Porſenna his Secretary, in ſtead of the King himſelf, did in ſcorn of torments threatened, burn off his own hand) he thought it not any whit prejudicial either to his ſafety, or credit, to enter league with them at the worſt hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his ſpleen was not quite abated, though Aruns his Son, and Brutus, his enemy, in ſingle combat, had ſlain each other. And here the Romans, although they loſt, Brutus got the field; and their Ladies, whoſe Champion he was, for their chaſtity, not for beauty, mourned the loſs of him one whole year. Into this place, for the reſidue of his year, was ſubrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia; and in his room (deceafing naturally before the year expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquinius, upon his overthrow, feeling the fates diſaſtrous, thought it no boot to ſtrive againſt the ſteam, but ſpent the reſidue of his time, which was about fourteen years, privately at Tuſculum. Yet his Son-in-law Mamilius Tullianus, ſtomaching a-freſh at thoſe old repulſes, becauſe Porſenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further ſuccour unto the Tarquines, muſtered up his Latins, and gave battel to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the iſſue uncertain, untill Aulus Poſthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magiſtry greater than Conſuls, purpoſely for this war, when firſt it was expected) to exaſperate his Soldiers courage, threw their own Enſigns amidſt the Enemies; and Coffus, or Spurius Caſſius, (Maſter of the Horſe-men, an aſſiſtant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might run with free violence, to recover again their Enſigns. This fight was ſo well performed, that a report went of Caſtor and Pollux, two gods, who came on milk-white Steeds, to be eye-witneſſes of their valour, and fellow-helpers of their Victory; for the General conſecrated a Temple to them, as a ſtipend for their pains. After this the Romans fierce ſpirits, having no object of valour abroad, reflected upon themſelves at home; and the ſixteenth year after the Kings expulſion, upon inſtigations of ſome deſperate backſtairs, thinking themſelves wrongfully oppreſſed by the Senate and Conſuls, they made an uproar in the holy Mount; untill by Mecenius Agrippa, his diſcreet alluſion, of the inconvenience in the Head and Belly's diſcord, to that preſent occaſion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might have ſome new Magiſtrates created, to whom they might appeal in caſes of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controverſies, the Conſuls authority notwithstanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this atonement among themſelves, themselves, they had continual War with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Among these, the Volsces and Æquians held them longest; who made War of themselves upon the Romans: whereby they lost the best City in their whole jurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Martius got the surname of Coriolanus: a name honourable then, as drawn from a great Victory; although, by reason of the poverty of the Town, a Roman General, in after times, would have been ashamed of that title. But yet these graces had been no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards in a great time of dearth, advised to sell corn, which they procured from Sicily, at too high a rate, to the people, whereupon Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalf, accused him, and after judgement banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsces, whom lately before he had vanquished, incited them to renew their forces again; which being committed unto him, and to Attius Tullus, he prevailed in field, so far forth, that he was come within four or five miles of the City. Incamping there, he made so sharp war, and was at such defiance with his Country, that he would not relent by any supplication of Embassadors, until his mother Veturia, and Volumnia his wife, with a pitifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subjects to their Country than friends to their Son and Husband, were more available to Rome than was any force of Arms. Hereupon Coriolanus dismissing his Army, was after put to death among the Volsces, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunity: or (as others surmise) living with them until old age, he died naturally.

Not long after this the Veii in Hetruria, provoked the Romans; against whom the Fabii, three hundred and six in number, all of one Family, intreated and obtained, that they only might be employed, as it had been in a private quarrel. These Fabii, after some good services, lying incamped at Cremora, were circumvented, and all slain: one only of that whole house had been left, by reason of infancy, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In process of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsces, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Consul, with his whole Army, had been discomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinnatus chosen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the highest honour in Rome, with success answerable to his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his Country in the space of sixteen days. In the continuance of this Volscean war, it was that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two years before chosen Governours of the State, and Inactors of Solons Laws amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the mean while the Consuls, and all other Magistrates) would have ravished Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginus, Captain of a company, and lying then in a Camp at Algidum. Hereupon the people in an uproar took the Hill Aventine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men to resign up their authority again to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or desire to revenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new war against the Veientes and their adherents, upon whom, having tried their forces with diversity of Captains, and variety of event, they vanquished the Falisci, and the Fidenates, and utterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falisci, Furius Camillus shewed no less integrity than fortitude. For when a Schoolmaster, by training forth into the Roman camp, many children of the principal Citizens, thought to betray the Town, yielding them all up as hostages: Camillus delivered this Traitor bound unto his Souldiers, willing them to whip him back into the City; which forthwith yielded unto him in reverence of his justice. The siege of Veii was ten years, and so troublesome, that the Romans were there first inforced to winter abroad under beasts skins (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they received pay) and to make vows never to return without Victory.

At length winning the City by a Mine, they got so large spoils, that they consecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythius: and the whole people in general were called to the ransacking of the City. But yet they were no less unthankfull to Camillus for his service, than before they had been to Coriolanus; for they banished him the City, upon some occasion of inequality in dividing the spoils: yet he requited their unkindness with a new piece of service against the fury of the Gauls; who being a populous Country, and very healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes now) lived so long, that the sons destitute of means, were enforced to roave abroad, seeking some place where to set up their rest: and withal being a Nation valiant in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandered as Rovers over many Countries. Some of them light'ning on Italy, let set upon Clusium a Town in Hetruria: whereof Rome having information (and being careful of her Confederate Towns) sent Embassadors, warning them to desist from such injurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, upon some injury offered by the Roman Embassadors, converted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow unto the Romans, by the River Allia, upon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for unlucky, and called Albensis in the Roman Calendar) they hastned towards the City. Then was Rome the true map of misery and desolation. For some leaving the City; some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and, every one shifting for himself ere the enemy came, Rome was abandoned as indefensible. The Vestal Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conveyed away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldness out of desperate fear, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the world, did set themselves in Thrones, in their several houses, hourly expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to dye, as they had lived, in State. The younger sort, with M. Manlius their Captain, took upon them to make good the Capitol.

By this the Gauls were entred the City, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoil, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senators, they sat in their Majesty with a grave resolution; having first revered them as gods, anon they tried whether they would dye like men. When the City was thoroughly rified, they attempted the Capitol: which held them work for the space of seven months. Once they were like to have surpris'd it by night, but being decry'd by the gaggling of Geese, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed upon: the Gauls being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gauls should take a thousand pound weight in gold, to desist from their siege. Whilest the gold was in weighing, the Gauls, with open insolency, made their weights too heavy: Brennus their Captain, casting his sword into the ballance, and with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquished must be patient perforce. But in the midst of this cavilling came Furius Camillus with an Army from Ardea, (where he had lived in his banishment) and fell upon the Gauls with such violence, that he dispersed their troops, quenched the fire of the City with their blood, forcing them to restore the spoils with advantage, and forbear the gold, in accepting which they had lately been so nice. Further, having rid the City of them, he so hotly pursued them thorow a great part of Italy, that the remainder of their Army which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this first, had the like ill success. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in single fight slew a several Champion of the Gauls) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable service, was afterwards accounted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their City, were earnestly bent to go to the Veii to inhabit; but Camillus dissuaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Veii they changed their government from Consuls to military Tribunes. The government of these also, after some years, was by civil dissention interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchy. Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled again, till, after many years expired, the Consular authority was established, it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should always be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365 years. And now Rome, by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minority, dares set forth against the warlike Sannites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirty miles off: situated between Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians their neighbours, that they forced them to yield themselves subjects to Rome, and undergo any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoever else to obtain protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had been their confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should devour the less, easily allowed of; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the abundance of Corn and Wine, pleasant Cities and Towns, but especially Capua itself, the fairest City then in all Italy.

The families of the Papirii and Fabii were most employed in the managing of this War, which endured the space of fifty years. And in this season were the Romans often times dangerously encountered by the Sannites, as when T. Veturius and Sp. Posthumus were Consuls, and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominy: and when Q. Fabius Gurgus lost the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great Victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. P. Pyrrhus, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrel. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but less warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long war it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Samnites) that the Latins began to challenge equal freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to have one of the Consuls yearly chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latins was not unreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latin Colony; besides all which, they made offer to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud to admit any such capitulation. So a great battle was fought between them: wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the virtue of the Consuls.

Manlius Torquatus and the elder Decius were then Consuls, whom the Soothsayers advertised, that the side should be victorious which lost the General in fight. Hereupon Decius the Consul exposed his life to the enemy, and purchased victory (as was believed) by his death. In which kind of devoting himself for his Army, the son of this Decius being after Consul, did imitate his father in the Hetrurian war. But (as Tully well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decii, that purchased victory, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a Religion, as required the lives of so worthy Citizens, to be sacrificed for their Country. The discipline of Manlius was no less resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemy. For breach of which order he caused his own son to be put to death, who had slain a Captain of the Latins, being challenged in single fight.

When the Latins, the Æqui, Volsci, Herulii, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other people, were brought under obedience; it was a vain labour for any people of Italy to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines adventured to try their fortune, and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consul, waiting all their Country with fire and sword, from the River Nar and Felia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians that made trial of the Roman arms, were the Tarentines and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as mediators between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptory denunciation of War, unto that party which should dare to refuse peace by them tendered. These threats which discovered their bad affection unto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were utterly subdued, matter enough of quarrel was found to examine their ability of performance.

The Romans complained that certain ships of theirs were robbed, and sent Embassadors unto Tarentum, to require amends. Upon some wrong done to these Embassadors, was laid the foundation of that War, wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Eruvians, and Apulians, joining with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subjects of Rome to rebel and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their own weakness. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrhus, by whose aid (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceived, that the Dominion of Rome should be confined unto more narrow bounds than all Italy, which already in a manner it did over-extend.

How Pyrrhus warred upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battels.

Pyrrhus, forsaken by the Macedonians, and unable to deal with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to live in rest: which he abhorred no less than a wiser Prince would have desired. He had a strong Army, and a good Fleet, which in that unsettled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdom: but the fall of Demetrius had so increased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom to make an offensive war upon him, without far greater forces: Antigonus, the son of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Towns, with the remainder of his Fathers Army and treasures, left in his hand. Upon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have won; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serve to give some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of employment, and covetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadors came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with brave offers, as needing no other aid aid than his good conduct, which to obtain, they would call themselves under his protection. They had in their company some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised, in behalf of their several Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as far as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and fill by one victory open the gate unto another. To which effect it is said, that once he answered Cynas his chief Counsellor, alking what he meant to do after every of the victories which he hoped to get: that having won Rome, he would soon be Master of all Italy; that, after Italy he would quickly get the Isle of Sicily; that, out of Sicily, he would pass over into Affrick, and win Carthage, with all the rest of the Country; and being strengthened with the force of all these Provinces, he would be too hard for any of those that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cynas enquired yet further, what they should do, when they were Lords of all. Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would live merrily; a thing (as Cynas then told him) that they presently might do, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his own.

Nevertheless, this Italian Expedition seemed unto Pyrrhus a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholastical disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Army, of almost thirty thousand men, well fortified, and well trained souldiers: part of which he sent over before him under Cynas, with the rest he followed in person. At his coming, he found the Tarentines, very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, utterly careless to provide for the war. Wherefore he was fain to shut up their Theatre, and other places of pleasure and resort, enforcing them to take arms, and making such a strict muster, as was to them very displeasing, though greatly beehaving to their estate.

Whilst he was occupied with these cares, Levinus the Roman Consul drew near, and began to waste Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this War.

The Lucanians were not ready to defend their own Country; the Samnites were careless of the harm, that fell not (as yet) upon themselves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would have been, but their valour was little: all of these had been accustomed to shrink for fear of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more upon his own forces: than the issue of their vaunting promises. He was now driven either to set forward with those that himself had brought into Italy, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little waste to be repaid; or else to weaken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all means he was careful to uphold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had been scattered by foul weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which he resolved to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom he proudly marched.

Levinus the Consul was not affrighted with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and give him battle ere all his adherents should be ready to joyn with him. This boldness of the Roman, and the slackness of the Messapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrrhus, to offer a treaty of peace: requiring to have the quarrel between the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to win time, that the Samnites and their fellows might arrive at his Camp; or whether, considering better at near distance, the weight of the business which he had taken in hand, he were desirous to quit it with his honour; the short answer that was returned to his proposition, gave him no means of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Judge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hereupon both Armies hastened their march unto the River of Siris: Levinus intended to fight before the arrival of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that River, until his own Army were full. Upon the first view of the Roman Camp, it was readily conceived by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to do with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a brave discipline of War: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde upon the passage of the river, that he might not be compelled to fight, until he saw his best advantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemy was not only skilful in the Art of War, but courageous in execution. For the Roman Army entered the Ford, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time began to pass the River in sundry places: which caused the Greeks to forsake the defence of their bank, and speedily retire unto their Camp.

This audacity forced Pyrrhus to battle; wherewith he thought it best to prefer them, ere the whole Army had recovered firm footing, and were in order. So directing his Captains how to marshal his battels; himself with the horse charged upon the Romans: who stoutly received him as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the duty of a careful General; nor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personal valour. It behoved him indeed to do his best; for he never met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slain under him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the use of his Kings armour, which was torn from his back. This accident had almost lost him the battel; but he perceiving it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and took from the Romans their vain joy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater loss (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as only spear and sword were used. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose unusual form and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (unaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustain; then was the victory quickly gotten. For the Roman battels, perceiving their horse put to the rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in flank, and over-born, by the force and huge bulk of those strange beasts; gave way to necessity, and saved themselves, as well as they could, by hasty flight: in which consternation, they were so forgetful of their discipline, that they tarried not to defend their Camp, but ran quite beyond it, leaving both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victory was soon spread over Italy; and the reputation was no less than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Consul, with a select Army, should lose in plain battel, not only the Field, but the Camp it self, being so notably fortified as they always were. And this honour was the more bravely won by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian friends, save the unwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content that he took, in having the glory of this action peculiarly his own, at such time as he blamed the Lucans and Samnites, for coming (as we say) a day after the Fair. Nevertheless he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them whilst with his honour he might; and to that purpose he sent unto them Cynæus his Embassadour, demanding only to have the Tarentines permitted to live at rest, and himself accepted as their especial friend. This did Cynæus, with all his cunning, and with liberal gifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recovering their captives, or their danger, by the riling of many States in Italy against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blind Senator, did stir them up to make good their honour by war. So they returned answer, that whilst Pyrrhus abode in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report that Cynæus made at his return, of the Roman puiſſance and virtue, as kindled in Pyrrhus a great desire of confederacy with that gallant City. Hereupon many kind Offices passed between them: but still when he urged his motion of peace, the answer was; He must first depart out of Italy, and then treat of peace.

In the mean season, each part made provision for war; the Romans levying a more mighty Army than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthened with access unto his forces of all the East parts of Italy. So they came to the trial of a second battel, wherein (though after long and cruel fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants gave to Pyrrhus a second victory. But this was not altogether so joyfull as the former had been: rather it gave him cause to say, that such another victory would be his utter undoing. For he had lost the flower of his Army in this battel: and though he drave the Romans out of their Camp, yet he could not force them out of it, nor saw any likelihood of prevailing against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilst he should be driven to spend upon his old stock. Neither could he expect that his Elephants should always stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight would soon teach the Romans, that were apt Scholars in such learning, how to make them unserviceable. Wherefore he desired nothing more, than how to carry his honour safe out of Italy: which to do (seeing the Romans would not help him, by offering or accepting any fair conditions of peace, or of truce) he took a slight occasion, on, presented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicil. How Pyrrhus, being invited into Sicil, forsook Italy; was the most of the life; and lost it in short space. Pyrrhus returns into Italy, where he is beaten by the Romans, and so goes back to his own Kingdom.

When Pyrrhus Ceranus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he presently seized upon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had been the due reward unto him, that had slain the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough to advance himself against Ceranus. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to have him their King, that had (as he professed) revenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousness of his fact, by which they were freed from subjection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that upon remembrance of his fathers great virtue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceranus: perceiving themselves that his reign might prove good, though his entrance had been wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serve to defeat Antigonus the son of Demetrius, that made an attempt upon the Kingdom. As for Antigonus the son of Seleucus, he was far off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Army neer unto Europe. Yet he made great show of meaning to revenge his Fathers death: but being stronger in money than in arms, he was content, after a while, to take fair words, and make peace with the murderer. While these three strove about the Kingdom, Pyrrhus, who thought his claim as good as any of theirs, made use of their dissention: threatening war, or promising his assistance to every one of them. By these means he strengthened himself, and greatly advantaged his Italian voyage, which he had then in hand: requesting money of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Pyrrhus, who gave him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (covenanting to have them restored at two years end) more for fear than for love: that so he might free himself from trouble, and quietly enjoy his Kingdom.

Thus Pyrrhus grew mighty on the sudden; and the power that by wicked means he had gotten, by means as wicked he encreased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong City of Cassandria was held by Arifone his filter, the widow of Lysimachus, who lay therein with her young children. Her he circumvented by making love to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of confanguinity) taking her to wife, with promise to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to perform; for it was not long, ere he slew them, and drave her into exile.

In the pride of this good success, which his villany found, vengeance came upon him from a far, by the fury of a Nation that he never heard of. Belgius a Captain of the Gauls, having forced his passage through many Countreys, unto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud message to Ceranus, commanding him to buy peace with money, or otherwise, to look for all the miseries of war. These Gauls were the race of those, that issued out of their Countrey, to seek new seats in that great expedition, wherein Brennus took and burnt the City of Rome. They had divided themselves, at their setting forth, into two companies; of which the one fell upon Italy; the other, passing through the Countreys that lye on the Northern side of the Adriatick Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, and the Regions adjoining, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeem peace with tribute, as now they would have compelled Ceranus to do: unto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight years after such time as their fellows had taken Rome.

When their Embassadours came to Pyrrhus, asking what he would give: his answer was, that he would be contented to give them peace, but it must be with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as hostages, and yield up their arms; otherwise he would neither pardon their boldness, nor give any credit to their words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gauls did laugh; saying, That they would soon confute with deeds, the vanity of such proud words. It may seem strange, that he, who had given away part of his Army unto Pyrrhus, for very fear; should be so confident in undertaking more mighty enemies. The King of the Dardaniens offered to lend him twenty thousand men against the Gauls: but he scorned the offer; saying, That he had the children of those, which under the conduct of Alexander had subdued all the East. Thus he issued forth against all the barbarous people with his famous Macedonians; as if the Victory must needs have followed the reputation of a great Name. But he soon found his great error when it was too late. For the Enemies were not only equal in strength of body, and fierceness of courage, but so far superior to the Macedonians in number, that few or none escaped their fury. Ptolemy himself grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilst the battle continued; and they presently strook off his head, which they threw to his men on the top of a Lance, to their utter astonishment.

The report of this great overthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Towns, and abandoned the whole Country as lost. Only Sophenes, a valiant Captain, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Army, with which he many times got the upper-hand, and hindered Belgus from using the Victory at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his virtue, the Soldiers would have made him King; which title he refused, and was contented with the name of a General. But (as mischiefs do seldom come alone) the good success of Belgus drew into Macedon, Brennus, another Captain of the Gauls, with an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse; against which mighty Army, when Sophenes with his weak troops made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians again compelled to hide themselves within their walls, leaving all their Country to the spoil of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and trodden down by a Nation that they had not heard of, in less than fifty years after the death of Alexander, who fought to discover and subdue unknown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia had been too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these news been carried to Pyrrhus in Italy, who fought a fair pretext of relinquishing his War with the Romans; but had not other tydings out of Sicily distracted him, and carried him away in pursuit of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who reigned over the whole Island, the Carthaginians sent an Army to conquer Sicily, out of which, by him, they had been expelled. This Army did so fast prevail, that the Silicians had no other hope to avoid slavery, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to live under the well-known heavy yoke of Carthage. To him therefore the Syracusan, Leontines, and Agraguntines, principal Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieved Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so unluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the business of Sicily more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he believed (as came after to pass) that his advantage upon Macedon would not so hastily pass away, but that he might find some occasion to lay hold on it at better leisure; over into Sicily he transported his Army, leaving the Tarentines to shift for themselves; yet not leaving them free as he found them, but with a Garrison in their Town to hold them in subjection.

As his departure out of Italy was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature advice; so were his actions following, until his return into Epirus; rather many and tumultuous, than well-ordered, or noteworthy. The Army which he carried into that Isle, consisted of thirty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse: with which, soon after his descent into Sicily, he forced the Carthaginians out of all, in effect, that they had therein. He also won the strong City of Eryx; and having beaten the Mamertines in battle, he began to change condition, and turn Tyrant. For he drove Sostratus (to whom this cruelty was suspected) out of the Island, and put Thenon of Syracuse to death, being jealous of his greatness; which two persons had faithfully served him, and delivered the great and rich City of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as he served himself, and saved the disreputation of his leaving Sicily, by an Embassy sent him from the Tarentines, and Sammites, imploring his present help against the Romans, who since his leaving Italy, had well-near dispossessed them of all that they had.

Taking this fair occasion, he embarked for Italy; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italy it self, by eighteen hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Country. Lastly, after he had recovered Tarentum, he fought a third battle with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious over him, and forced him out of Italy into his own Epirus.

A Prince he was far more valiant than constant; and had he been but a General of an Army for some other great King or State, and had been directed to have conquered any one Country or Kingdom, it is to be thought, that he would have purchased no less honour, than any man of War, either preceding or succeeding him; for a greater Captain, or a valiant man, hath been nowhere found. But he never stayed upon any enterprise; which was, indeed, the disease he had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

§. IV.

How Antigonus, the Son of Demetrius, delivered Macedon from the Gauls. How Pyrrhus won the Kingdom of Macedon from Antigonus.

THE virtue of Sophenes being too weak to defend the Kingdom of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgus, failing him in his attempts against Brennus; the Macedonians were no less glad to submit themselves unto the government of Antigonus, than they had been formerly desirous to free themselves from the impotent rule of his Father Demetrius. His coming into the Country with an Army, Navy, and Treasure, beseeching a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driven to use against the Barbarians, only those forces which he brought with him, having none other than good wives of the Macedons to take his part. Brennus with the main strength of his Army, was gone to spoil the Temple of Apollo at Delfos, having left no more behind him, than he thought necessary to guard the borders of Macedon and Pannonia; which were about fifteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of their fellows: and therefore sent unto Antigonus, offering to sell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, he had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was unwilling to weaken his reputation by condescending to their proud demands: yet he judged it unfit to exasperate their furious choler, by uncourteous words or usage, as Ceraunus had over-fondly done. Wherefore he entertained their Embassadors in very loving and sumptuous manner, with a royal feast: wherein he exposed to their view such abundance of massie gold and silver, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the vessels, wherein it was served. He thought hereby to make them understand how great a Prince he was, and how able if need required, to wage a mighty Army.

To which end, he likewise did shew unto them his Camp and Navy, but especially his Elephants. But all this bravery served only to kindle their greedy appetites; who seeing his ships heavily laden, his Camp full of wealth, and ill fortified, himself (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage, inferior unto the Gauls, thought all time lost wherein they suffered the present possessors to spend the riches which they accounted assuredly their own. They returned therefore to their companions with none other news in their mouths, than of spoil and purchase: which tale carried the Gauls head-long to Antigonus his Camp, where they expected a greater booty, than the victory over Ceraunus had given to Belgus. Their coming was terrible and sudden; yet not so sudden, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who disfrustring the courage of his own men, dislodged somewhat before their arrival, and conveyed himself, with his whole Army and Carriage, into certain woods adjoining, where he lay close.

The Gauls, finding his Camp forsaken, were not hasty to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the empty Cabbins of the Soldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched every place in vain, angry at their lost labour, they marched with all speed towards the Sea-side; that they might fall upon him, whilst he was busy in getting his Men and Carriages a ship-board. But the success was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terror which they had brought upon Antigonus, they were so careless of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoil of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Army had left Antigonus, where he lay in covert; and had saved it self by getting aboard the Fleet: in which number were some well-experienced men of War: who discovering the much advantage offered unto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, took courage, and encouraged others to lay manly hold upon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Soldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gave so brave a charge upon the disordered Gauls, that their contemptuous boldness was thereby changed into sudden fear, and they, after a great slaughter, driven to cast themselves into the service of Antigonus.

The fame of this Victory caused all the barbarous barbarous Nations in those quarters to recollect their ancient belief of the Macedonian valour: by which the terrible and resistless oppressors of so many Countries were overthrown.

To speak more of the Gauls in this place, and to shew how, about these times, three Tribes of them passed over into Asia the less, with their wars and conquests there; I hold it needless: the victorious Armies of the Romans taming them hereafter in the Countries which now they wan, shall give better occasion to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howsoever the good success of Antigonus got him reputation among the barbarous people; yet his own Souldiers, that without his leading had won this Victory, could not thereupon be persuaded to think him a good man of war: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the service, wherein his conduct was no better than creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appear) was greatly helpful unto Pyrhus: though as yet he knew not so much. For Pyrhus, when his affairs in Italy stood upon hard terms, had sent unto Antigonus for help: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he sure to get either a supply, wherewith to continue his War against the Romans; or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italy, under colour of making his word good, in seeking revenge. The threats which he had used in bravery, meer necessity forced him at his return into Epirus, to put in practice.

He brought home with him eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse: an Army too little to be employed, by his restless nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had means to keep in pay. Therefore he fell upon Macedon; intending to take what spoil he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this business, two thousand of Antigonus's Souldiers revolted unto Pyrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such fair beginnings easily persuaded the courage of this daring Prince to set upon Antigonus himself, and to hazard his fortune, in trial of a Battel, for the whole Kingdom of Macedon.

It appears, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot warrior; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to weary him out of the Country. For Pyrhus overtook him in a straight passage, and charged him in the rear; wherein were the Gauls and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength; a manifest proof that he was in retreat. The Gauls very bravely sustained Pyrhus's impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slain) after a sharp fight: wherein it seems that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the straight, and not advancing to their succour, took away their courage, by deceiving their expectation. The Captains of the Elephants were taken soon after; who finding themselves exposed to the same violence that had consumed so many of the Gauls, yielded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort; which emboldened Pyrhus to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was matter of extreme difficulty (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seen so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrhus; who discovered so well their affections, that he adventured to draw near in person, and exhorted them to yield. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader refused to become his follower. All forsook Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and money enough to entertain a greater power, had he known where to levy it. But whilst he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his service; whereby he might repair his loss: Ptolemy, the Son of Pyrhus, came upon him, and easily defeating his weak forces, drove him to flee from the parts about Macedon, to those Towns afar off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himself a King.

This good success revived the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to forget all sorrow of his late misfortunes in the Roman War: so that he sent for his Son Helenus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come over into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians thirst for themselves.

How Pyrhus assailed Sparta without success. His enterprise upon Argos, and his death.

Pyrhus had now conceived a great hope that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing that in open fight he had vanquished the Gauls, and beaten Antigonus, and and won the Kingdom of Macedon. There was not in all Greece, nor, indeed, in all the Lands that Alexander had won, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to be set up against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might do what he pleased. He raised therefore an Army, consisting of five and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and four and twenty Elephants; pretending War against Antigonus; and the giving liberty to those Towns in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subjection; though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made; for accomplishment of some design more important than War against a Prince already vanquished; and almost utterly dejected. Especially the Lacedemonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Country, had betaken himself to Pyrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdom. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrhus make shew of any displeasure that he bare unto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to have two of his own younger Sons trained up in that City, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, even till he entered upon Laconia; where, presently he demeaned himself as an open enemy; excusing himself and his former dissembling words with a jest; That he followed her in the Lacedemonian custom, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedemonians, to deal in like sort with others, whom, in the time of their greatness, they sought to oppress: but now they complained of that, as falsehood, in Pyrhus, which they always practised in wisdom, till it made them distrustful, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Nevertheless, they were not wanting to themselves in this dangerous extremity. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Town; causing such as could bear arms to reserve themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrhus had unwisely deferred, upon assurance of prevailing.

Sparta was never fortified, before this time, otherwise than with armed Citizens: soon after this (it being built upon uneven ground, and, for the most part, hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with walls, at the present only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance seemed most easy. Three days together it was assailed by Pyrhus exceeding fiercely; and no less stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserved the Town the first day; whereinto the violence of Pyrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindful of saving the person of their King, than of breaking into the City, though already they had torn in funder the Barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus's Captains got into Sparta, with a good strength of men; and Aræus the King returned out of Crete (where he had been helping his friends in War) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his own Country stood, until he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrhus a desire to prevail against all impediments. But the third dayes work shewed how great his error had been, in forbearing to assault the Town at his first coming. For he was so manfully repelled, that he saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Army, though not strong enough to meet the Enemy in plain field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrhus doubtful what way to take; being diversely affected, by the difficulty of his enterprise in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilst he was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inviting him thither; with promise to deliver that City into his hands.

Civil Dissention raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of several factions to call in Pyrhus and Antigonus; but the coming of these two Princes taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous to rid their hands of such powerful assistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himself to be. Antigonus told the Argives, that he came to save them from the tyranny of Pyrhus; and that he would be gone, if they need not his help. On the other side, Pyrhus would needs persuade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argives took full pleasure in hearing the Fox and Kite at strife, which of them should keep the Chickens from his enemy: and therefore prayed them both to divert their powers some other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condescended, and gave hostages to assure his word: for he was the weaker, and stood in need of good will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promise: Hottages he would give none to his inferiours, especially meaning deceit. This made them suspect his purpose to be such, as indeed it was. Yet he less regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of assurance, by giving such a bond, as he intended to break ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the City should be opened by night unto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Army without any tumult entred the City: till the Elephants, with Towers on their back, cloyed the way, being too high to pass the Gate. The taking off, and setting on again of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both give alarm to the City, and some leisure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully master it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindred the Gauls (that had the Vanguard) being ignorant of the wayes in the dark night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much advantage, by their knowledge of every by-passage: and setting upon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great loss and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore understanding by the confused noise, and unequal shoutings of his own men, that they were in distress, entred the City in person, to take order for their relief, and assurance of the place. But the darkness, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, until break of day. Then began he to make his passage by force, and so far prevailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that place the Image of a Wolf and a Bull, in such positure as if they had been combatant, he called to mind an Oracle, which threatned him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolf: and that hereupon he made retreat.

Indeed, the coming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his own men, with divers ill accidents, gave him reasonable cause to have retired out of the City, though the Wolf and Bull had been away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gave back, so did others thrust forward, and the Argives pressing hard upon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retreat with his own sword. The tops of the houses were covered with Women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her own Son in dangerous case, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore she took a tile-stone, or slate, and threw it so violently down on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to the ground astonished with the blow; and lying in that case, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the restless ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdom of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith possessed the Army, the body, and the children of his Enemy. The body of Pyrrhus had honourable burial, and was given by Antigonus unto Helenus his Son; which young Prince he graciously sent home into his Fathers Kingdom of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdom of Macedon; the posterity of Selencus reigned over Asia and Syria; and the house of Ptolomy had quiet possession of Egypt: untill such time as the City of Rome, swallowing all up, digested these, among other Countreys, into the body of her own Empire.

Of the first Punick War.

§. I.

A Discussion of that Probleme of Livie; Whether the Romans could have resisted the Great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman souldier, was of equal valour to the English.

THAT Question handled by Livie, Whether the Great Alexander could have prevailed against the Romans, if after his Eastern Conquest, he had bent all his Forces against them, hath been, and is the subject of much dispute; which (as it seems to me) the arguments on both sides do not so well explain, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath given of the Roman power in his dayes. For if he, a Commander (in Hannibals judgement) inferiour to Alexander, though to none else, could with a small strength of men, and little store of money, or of other needfull helps in War, vanquish them in two Battels, and endanger their Estate, when it was well settled and held the best part of Italy, under a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander have done, that was abundantly provided of all which is needfull to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of employment, coming upon them before their Dominion was half so well settled? It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more than thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse (as indeed, at his first passage into Asia, he carried over not many more) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base effeminate name Asiatiques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolomy, Antigonus and Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed, every one of which (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power, shall easily find, that such a reckoning is far short of the truth.

It were needless to speak of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of Battery, and the like: of all which the Macedonian had abundance; the Roman having might, save men and arms. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punic War, were trained in the rudiments of Navigation; sitting upon the shore, and beating the sand with poles, to practise the stroke of the Oar, as not daring to launch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceive how far too weak they would have proved in such services.

Now for helpers in War; I do not see why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deserve to be laid in, ballance against those parts of Italy, which the Romans held in ill-assured subjection. To omit therefore all benefit that the Eastern World, more wealthy, indeed, than valiant, could have afforded unto the Macedonians: let us only conjecture, how the States of Sicil and Carthage, nearest neighbours to such a quarrel (had it happened) would have stood affected. The Sicilians were for the most part Grecians; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily have submitted themselves unto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what terms they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appear anon. Sure it is, that Alexander, coming into those parts, would have brought excessive joy to them that were fain to get the help of Pyrrius, by offering to become his subjects. As for the Carthaginians, if Agathocles the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his own besieged City, could by adventuring to sail into Africk, put their Dominion, yea, and Carthage it self, in extrem hazard; shall we think that they would have been able to withstand Alexander? But why do I question their ability, seeing that they sent Embassadors, with their submission, as far as Babylon, ere the War drew near them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some other few Italian friends (of which yet there were none that forsook them not, at some time, both before and after this) have opposed their valour and good military discipline, against the power of all Countreys to them known, if they would have made resistance. How they could have sped well, in undertaking such a match; it is uneasy to find in discourse of humane reason. It is true, that virtue and fortune work wonders; but it is against cowardly fools, and the unfortunate: for whosoever contends with one too mighty for him, either must excel in these, as much as his enemy goes beyond him in power; or else must look both to be overcome, and to be cast down so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and virtue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the conqueror. Whether the Roman or the Macedonian were in those days, the better Soldier, I will not take upon me to determine: though I might without partiality, deliver mine own opinion, and prefer that Army, which followed not only Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of War, before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning fortune, who can give a rule that shall all ways hold? Alexander was victorious in every Battle that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of every War. But forasmuch as Livie hath judged this a matter worthy of consideration; I think it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italy: where in three years after his death, the two Roman Consuls, together with all the powers of that State, were surprized by the Sammites, and enforced to yield up their arms. We may therefore permit Livie to admire his own Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captains of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers: that the same conceit should blind our judgement, we cannot permit without much vanity.

Now in deciding such a Controversie, we think it were not amiss, for an Englishman, to give such a sentence between the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) between the Ardeates and Aricini, that strove about a piece of Land; saying, that it belonged unto neither of them, but unto the Romans themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman were the best Warriour? I will answer, The Englishman.

man. For it will soon appear to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in war, that they were performed by no advantage of weapon; against no savage or unmanly people; the enemy being far superiour unto us in number, and all needful provisions, yea, as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of War.

In what sort Philip won his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Persians and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquished; as likewise of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, against such arms as it commonly encountered: any man, that hath taken pains to read the foregoing story of them, doth sufficiently understand. Yet was this Phalanx never, or very seldom, able to stand against the Roman Armies; which were embattled in so excellent a form, as I know not whether any Nation besides them have used, either before or since. The Roman weapons likewise, both offensive and defensive, were of greater use than those with which any other Nation hath served, before the fiery instruments of Gun-powder were known. As for the enemies with which Rome had to do, we find, that they which did over-match him in numbers, were as far over-matched by her in weapons; and that they, of whom she had little advantage in arms, had as little advantage of her in multitude. This also (as Plutarch well observeth) was a part of her happiness; that she was never over-laid with two great Wars at once.

Hereby it came to pass, that having at first increased her strength by acceffion of the Sabines; having won the State of Alba, against which she adventured her own self, as it were in wager, upon the heads of three Champions: and having thereby made her self Princess of Latium, she did afterwards by long war, in many ages, extend her Dominion over all Italy. The Carthaginians had well-near oppressed her: but her Souldiers were Mercenary; so that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten at their own doors. The Aetolians, and, with them, all, or the most of Greece, assisted her against Philip the Macedonian: he being beaten, did lend her his help to beat the same Aetolians. The wars against Antiochus, and other Asiatiques, were such as gave to Rome small cause of boast, though much of joy: for those opposites were as bafe of courage, as the lands which they held were abundant of riches. Sicil, Spain, and all Greece, fell into her hands, by using her aid to protest them against the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I shall not need to speak of her other conquests: it was eafie to get more when she had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many famous victories: I am not so idle. This I say; That among all their wars, I find not any, wherein their valour hath appeared comparable to the English. If my judgement seem over-partial, our wars in France may help to make it good.

First therefore it is well known, that Rome (or perhaps all the world besides) had never any to brave a Commander in war as Julius Caesar: and that no Roman Army was comparable unto that which served under the same Caesar. Likewise, it is apparent, that this gallant Army, which had given fair proof of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Helvetian war, when it first entered into Gaul; was nevertheless utterly disheartened, when Caesar led it against the Germans. So that we may justly impute all that was extraordinary in the valour of Caesars men, to their long exercise, under so good a Leader, in so great a War. Now let us in general compare with the deeds done by these best of Roman Souldiers, in their principal service; the things performed in the same Country, by our common English Souldiers, levied in haste, from following the Cart, or sitting on the shop-stall: so shall we see the difference. Herein will we deal fairly, and believe Caesar in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Historians to witness, what actions were performed by the English. In Caesars time France was inhabited by the Gauls, a stout people, but inferior to the French, by whom they were subdued; even when the Romans gave them assistance. The Country of Gaul was rent in sunder (as Caesar witnesseth) into many Lordships: some of which were governed by petty Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in such sort as might make it applicable to the nearest Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not only in general through the whole Country, but between the petty States, yea in every City, and almost in every house. What greater advantage could a Conquerour desire? Yet there was a greater. Arminius, with his Germans, had over-run the Country, and held much part of it in subjection, little different from meer slavery: yea, so often had the Germans prevailed in war upon the Gauls, that the Gauls, (who had sometimes been the better Souldiers) did hold themselves no way equal ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious City ran the same fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and since. The ruine of the goodliest pieces of the world fore-thews the dissolution of the whole.

About one hundred years after such time as it was cast down, the Senate of Rome caused it to be re-built: and by Gracchus it was called Junonia: it was again and again abandoned and re-peopled, taken and re-taken; by Junfericus the Vandal, by Beldisarius under Byzantium, by the Perfians, by the Egyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The seat thereof was exceeding strong: and while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, invincible. For the Sea compassed it about, saving that it was tyed to the Main by a neck of Land; which passage had two miles and more of breadth (Appian saith, three miles and one furlong) by which we may be induced to believe the common report, that the City it self was above twenty miles in compass; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to have been twice as great.

It had three Walls without the Wall of the City; and between each of those, three or four Streets, with Vaults under ground, of thirty foot deep, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food: over these they had stables for four thousand horse, and Granaries for their provender. They had also lodgings in the Streets, between these out-walls, for four thousand horse-men, and twenty thousand foot-men, which (according to the discipline used now by those of China) never peppered the City. It had towards the South part, the Castle of Byrsa, to which Servius gives two and twenty furlongs in compass, that maketh two miles and a half. This was the same piece of ground which Dido obtained of the Lybians, when she got leave to buy only so much Land of them, as she could compass with an Ox hide. On the West-side it had also the Salt-Sea, but in the nature of a standing pool; for a certain arm of Land, fastened to the ground, on which the City stood, stretched it self towards the West-continent, and left but seventy foot open for the Sea to enter. Over this standing-Sea was built a most sumptuous Arsenal, having their Ships and Gallies riding under it.

The form of their Common-wealth resembled that of Sparta; for they had titular Kings, and the Aristocratical Power of Senators. But (as Regius well observeth) the people in latter times usurped too great authority in their Councils. This confusion in Government, together, with the trust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruine, were their avarice and their cruelty.

(a) Their avarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinary tributes) the one (b) half of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great offices, not upon gentle and merciful persons, but upon those who would best tyrannize over the people, to augment their treasures. Their cruelty appeared, in putting them to death without mercy; that had offended through ignorance: the one of these rendered them odious to their Vassals, whom it made ready upon all occasions, to revolt from them: the other did break of the spirits of their Generals, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad, the fear of a cruel death at home. Hereby it came to pass, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian Forces, after some great loss received, have desperately cast themselves, with all that remained under their charge, into the throat of destruction; holding it necessary, either to repair their losses quickly, or to ruine all together: and few of them have dared to manage their own best projects, after that good form, where, in their first conceived them, for fear left the manner of their proceeding should be mis-interpreted: It being the Carthaginian Rule, to crucify, not only the unhappy Captain, but even him, whose bad counsel had prospered even him. The faults, where-with, in general, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I find to be these; lust, cruelty, avarice, craft, unfaithfulness, and perjury. Whether the Romans themselves were free from the same crimes, let the trial be referred unto their actions. The first is the league between Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: having been made the year following the expulsion of Targuin. In that league the Carthaginians had the superiority, as imposing upon the Romans the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as have traded. And it is the free-man, and not the slave, that had compassed the fence of shame delivered by cowardice. How free the English Yeomen have been in times, not long since past, Fartius hath shewed in his praise of our Countryes Laws. But I may say, that they are more free now than ever; and our Nobility and Gentry more both taught them to raise their Rems, since by Inclosures, and diminishing of Mannors, the Court Baron, and the Court Leet, the Privileges of the Gentry of England, have been diminished, the Tenants having payed unto their Lords their rack Rent, owe them now no service at all, and (perchance) as little love.

trade in some part of Africa, nor suffer and ship of theirs to pass beyond the headland, or cape, then called the fair Promontory, unless it were by force of tempest: whereas on the other side, no Haven in Italy was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second league was made long after, which (howsoever it hath pleased Livy to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreaty) was more strict than the former: prohibiting the Romans to have trade in any part of Africa, or in the Island of Sardinia.

By these two treaties it may appear, that the Carthaginians had an intent not only to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge of the state of Africa; but to countenance and uphold them, in their troubling all Italy, whereby they themselves might have the better means to occupy all Sicily, whilst that Island should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon we find good cause of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crown of gold, weighing twenty and five pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Samnites were overthrown. But the little state of Rome prevailed faster in Italy, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicily. For that mighty army of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africa, into Sicily, was only two Cities therein: many great fleets were devoured by tempests; and howsoever the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their own valour, or by the assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repair their own losses; and take revenge upon those Invaders. But never were the people of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicily, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Island in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilst the Carthaginians were busy in making their advantage of this good opportunity; Pyrrhus, invited by the Tarentines and their fellows, came into Italy, where he made sharp war upon the Romans. These news were unpleasant to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtle Nation, easily fore-saw, that the same busy disposition which had brought this Prince out of Greece into Italy, would as easily transport him over into Sicily, as soon as he could finish his Roman war. To prevent this danger, they sent Mago Embassador to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were sorry to hear what misadventure had befallen the Romans their good friends in this war with Pyrrhus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to assist the state of Rome, by sending an Army into Italy; if their help were thought needful, against the Epirots.

It was indeed the main desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his work in Italy, that they might at good leisure, pursue their business in Sicily: which caused them to make so goodly an offer. But the Romans were two high-minded; and refused to accept any such aid of their friend, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seem unable to stand by their own strength. Yet the message was taken lovingly, as it ought; and the former league between Rome and Carthage renewed; with covenants added, concerning the present business; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be with reservation of liberty, to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should invade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, using all means to sound his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one upon every new occasion, changeth his own purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicily: whether though in fine he was neither getter nor savor, yet he clean defeated the purposes of Carthage, leaving them, at his departure from thence, as far from any aid, as when they first began.

So many disasters in an enterprise, that from the first undertaking had been so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well have induced the Carthaginians to believe, that an higher providence resisted their intendment. But their desire of winning that fruitful Island, was so inveterate, that with unwearied patience, they still continued in hope of so much the greater an harvest, by how much their cost and pain therein buried had been the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses; and by force of practice, recovered in few years all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chief City of the Island; that so they might the better enable themselves to deal with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a troop of Campanian Souldiers, that had served under Agathocles, being entertained within Messana as friends, and finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, took advantage of the power that they had to do wrong; and with perfidious cruelty, slew those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the City, Lands, Goods, and Wives of those whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that meer desperation of finding any that would approve their barbarous treachery, added rage unto their stoutness. Having therefore not any other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they over-ran all the Country round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messana against the Cities of Sicil Confederate, to wit, against the Syracusans, and others, but they rather won upon them; yea, and upon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turned her back to these Mamertines, the Syracusans was fast upon them; and finally, confining them within the walls of Messana, they also with a powerful army besieged the City. It hapned ill, that about the same time a contention began between the Syracusan Souldiers, then lying at Magara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Governours of the Common wealth; which proceeded so far, that the Army elected two Governours among themselves, to wit, Artemidorus and Hieron, that was afterwards King. Hieron, being for his years excellently adorned with many virtues, although it was contrary to the policy of that State, to approve any election made by the Souldiers; yet for the great clemency used at his first entrance, he was by general consent established and made Governour. This office he rather used as a Scale, thereby to climb to some higher degree, than rested content with his present preferment.

In brief, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himself within the City; and somewhat without it, that gave impediment to his obtaining, and safe keeping of the place he fought, to wit, a powerful party within the Town, and certain mutinous troops of Souldiers without, often and easily moved to sedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himself, he took to Wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authority among the Syracusans. For the second, leading out the Army to besiege Messana, he quartered all those companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the City, and leading the rest of his Horse and Foot unto the other side, as if he would have assaulted it in two several parts, he marched away under the covert of the Town walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the afflicted: So returning home, and levying an Army of his own Citizens, well trained and obedient, he halted again towards Messana, and was by the Mamertines (grown proud by their former victory over the Mutiners) encountered in the plains of Mylan, where he obtained a most signal victory; and leading with him their Commander captive into Syracuse, himself by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselves utterly enfeebled, some of them resolved to give themselves to the Carthaginians, others to crave assistance of the Romans: to each of whom the several faction dispatched Embassadors for the very same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soon ready to lay hold upon the good offer: so that a Captain of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, whereof they that had sent for him gave him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captain, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of doors, and the Town referred for other Matters.

The new news did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captain, as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Army to besiege Messana, as a Town that rebelled, having once been theirs. Hieron the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people incensed with the smart of injuries lately received) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entered into a league, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all sides were closed up within Messana: the Carthaginians lying with a Navy at Sea, and with an Army on the one side of the Town, whilst Hieron with his Syracusans lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger came Appius Claudius, the Roman Consul, with an Army to the streights of Sicil: which passing by night with notable audacity, he put himself into the Town, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying unto them that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore he was come to give them protection, even by force of War, if reason would not prevail.

This message was utterly neglected, and so began the War between Rome and Carthage; wherein it will then be to shew on which part was the Justice of the quarrel, rell, when some actions of the Romans lately foregoing this, have been first considered.

§. III.

The beginning of the first Punic war. That it was unjustly undertaken by the Romans.

When Pyrrhus began his war in Italy, the City of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not only fearing to be taken by the Epirot, but much more distressed by the Carthaginians, as likely to seize upon it in that busy time, sought aid from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, consisting of four thousand Souldiers, under the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leisure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Messana (a City in Sicil, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise divided than by a narrow Sea, which severeth it from Italy) and rather weighing the greatness of the booty, than the odiousness of the villany, by which it was gotten; resolved finally, to make the like purchase; by taking the like wicked course. Confederating therefore themselves with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; dividing the spoil, and all which that State had, among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate and people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the world made a more severe profession of justice, than they did during all the time of their growing greatness,) resolved, after a while, to take revenge upon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italy by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulness of their fact, hopeless of pardon) defended themselves with an obstinate resolution; yet in the end, the assaults forced them; and those which escaped the present fury, were brought bound to Rome, where, after the usual torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custom of the country, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders, and the people of Rhegium were again restored to their former liberty and estates.

This execution of Justice being newly performed, and the same thereof founding honourably through all quarters of Italy: messengers came to Rome from Messana, declaring help against the Carthaginians, and Syracusans, that were in a readiness to inflict the like punishment upon the Mamertines, for the like offence. A very impudent request it was, which they made: who having both given example or that villany to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with joyful forces to make it good, do intreat the Judges to give them that assistance, which they were wont to receive from their fellow-thieves.

The Romans could not suddenly resolve, whether the way of honesty or of profit were to be followed; they evermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered, how contrary the course of succouring the Mamertines was to their former counsels and actions: seeing for the same offences they had lately put to torment, and to the sword, their own Souldiers, and restored the oppressed to their liberty. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best part of Africa, of the Mediterranean Islands, of a great part of Spain, and some part of Sicil itself; whilst all they feared, that Syracuse therein seated (a City in beauty and riches, little at that time inferior to Carthage, and far superior to Rome itself) might become theirs; the safety of their own estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driven to despair by the Romans) should deliver up Messana, with those other holds that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand between Carthage, and the Lordship of Sicil: for Syracuse itself could not, for want of succor, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten upon that passage from the main Land. It was further considered; that the opportunity of Messana was such, as would not only debar all succours out of the continent, from arrival in Sicil; but would serve as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might have entrance into Italy, at their own pleasure.

These considerations of profit at hand, and of preventing danger, that threatened from a far, did so prevail above all regard of honesty, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacy with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consul, presently dispatched away for Messana: into which he entered, and undertook the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arrival; and less mounved, with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did far exceed him in number of men; the whole Island was ready to relieve them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Town. All this Appius himself well understood: and against all this he thought the stiff mettall of his Roman Souldiers a sufficient remedy. Therefore he resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his coming was to send them away from the Town; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficial to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such fort, as one quarter was not well able to relieve another in distress. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto he had wilfully cast his own mutinous followers not long before: only he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his own quarter, without help of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by unexpected fall, to surprise his trenches) arranged his men in order of battel, wherewith he presented him. The Syracusan wanted not courage to fight; but surely he wanted good advice: else would he not have hazarded all his power against an enemy of whom he had made no trial; when it had been easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his own Camp. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorn the beginning of his reign. But he was well beaten, and driven to save himself within his trenches: by which loss, he learned a point of wisdom, that stood him and his Kingdom in good stead all the days of his life. It was a foolish desire of revenge, that had made the Syracusians so buis, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana been taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse itself must have sought help from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mighty Cities) but a small stock, which it behooveth him to govern well: such another loss would have made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake up his Camp: and retired home: intending to let them stand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargain. The next day, Claudius perceiving the Sicilian Army gone, did with great courage, and with much alacrity of his Souldiers, give charge upon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enemy forsook both field and camp, leaving all the Country open to the Romans; who having spoiled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege unto the great City of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoever they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes of attaining to greater matters, than at the first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any form of terror in the City of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost than what had been prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspicion of War from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entered into this war; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honesty (for questionless the enterprise was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict terms of lawfulness; whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yield themselves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, distressed by the Sammites, had done) I cannot find: neither can I find how the messengers of those folk, whereof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such surrendry in the publick name of all.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawful surrendry of themselves and their possessions, were become subject unto Rome, by what better title could the Romans assist the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have aided the Campanes against the Sammites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some point serving to clear this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtless it is, that no company of Pyrates, Thieves, Out-laws, Murderers, or such other Malefactors, can by any good success of their villany, obtain the privilege of civil societies, to make league or truce; yea, or to require fair war: but are by all means, as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take upon me to maintain that opinion of some Civilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince or State can give protection to such as these, as long as any other is using the sword of vengeance against them, without becoming necessary to their crimes. Wherefore we may esteem this action of the Romans so far from being justifiable, by any pretence of confederacy made with them; as that contrariwise, by admitting this nest of Murderers and Thieves into their protection, they justly deserved to be warred upon themselves, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Messana had been taken, and the Mamertines all slain, e're any news of the Confederacy had been brought unto the besiegers. The great Alexander was so far perswaded herein; that he did put to sword all the Branchiade (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their City, notwithstanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; because they were descended from a company of Milefians, who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Town and Country, which these of their posterity enjoyed. Nevertheless in course of humane justice, long and peaceable possession gives jus acquisitionis, a kind of right by prescription unto that which was first obtained by wicked means: and doth free the descendants from the crime of their Ancestors, whose villanies they do not exercise. But that the same generation of Thieves, which by a detestable fact hath purchased a rich Town, should be acknowledged a lawfull company of Citizens, there is no shew of right. For even the Conqueror that by open War obtaineth a Kingdom, doth not confirm his title, by those victories which gave him first possession: but length of time is requisite to establish him, unless by some alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his claim, as did our King Henry the first, by his marriage with Maud, that was daughter of Malcolm, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Niece of Edmund Ironside. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had so good) of justice, in this quarrel, than had the Goths, Hunnes, Vandals, and other Nations, of the Wars that they made upon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her self, in the time of her visitation, was burnt to the ground.

§. IV.

Of the Island of Sicil.

t. I.

The quality of the Island: and the first inhabitants thereof.

THE defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messana, being now no longer since the first victories of Appianus Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage are about to contend: it will be agreeable unto the order, which in the like cases we have observed, to make a brief collection of things concerning that noble Island, which have been the stage of many great acts, performed as well before and after, as in this present War.

That Sicil was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demie-Isle, adjoining to Italy, as a part of Brutium in Calabria, near unto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest severed from the same: it is a general opinion of all antiquity. But at what certain time this division happened, there is no memorial remaining in any ancient writer. Strabo, Pliny, Plin. l. x. c. 91. Sil. l. 5. and Dionysius affirm, that it was caused by an earth-quake; Silius and Calliodorus do think it to have been done by the rage and violence of the tide, and surges of the Sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Euboea severed from Boeotia; Atalante and Marcis from Euboea; Silvie here in England, from the cape of Cornwall; and Britain it self (as may seem by Vesfigians arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaul. But for Sicil, they which lend their ears to fables, do attribute the cause of it to Neptune (as Eustathius witnesseth) who with his three-forked Mace, in favour of Jocastus, the son of Xolus, divided it from the main land, and so made it an Island, which before was but a Demie-Isle; that by that means he might the more safely inhabit, and possess the same. Diodorus Siculus, moved by the authority of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of Orion, l. 4. c. 14. Diod. Sic. funding it from Italy, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting Orion de Fab. 44) through the rocks and mountains) first opened the Sicilian streights, as Hercules did those of Gibraltar.

They which value the Islands of the midland Sea, according to their quantity and content, do make this the greatest, as Eustathius and Strabo, who affirm this, not only to excell the rest for bigness, but also for goodness of soil. As concerning the form of this Island, Pomponius Mela saith, it is like that Capital letter of the Greek, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally known to be true. That the whole Island was consecrated to Ceres and Proserpina, all old writers with one consent affirm. To Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of setting and sowing of Corn: to Proserpina, not so much for that she was from hence violently kennels from the covering of our bodies with the skins of beasts, not only to filk and gold, but to the very skins of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take revenge of the excess, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longiorque duxit, longissima subit: Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and a time, longer than the rest, shall overthrow it.

The Plantation of the Greeks in Sicil.

When the first Inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: it happened, that one Theocler, a Greek, being driven upon that Coast by an Eastern wind, and finding true the commendations thereof, which had been thought fabulous, being delivered only by Poets, gave information to the Athenians of this his discovery, and proposed unto them the benefit of this easie Conquest offering to become their guide. But Theocler was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore he took the same course that Columbus afterwards did. He over-laboured not himself in perswading the Noble Athenians (who thought themselves to be well enough already) to their own profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needy and indolent, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By these was built the City of Naxos, and a Colony planted of Eubœans.

But the rest of the Greeks were wiser than our Western Princes of Europe: For they had no Pope, that should forbid them to occupy the void places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubœans, and landed in Sicil, near unto that City, called afterward * Syracus: of which, that part only was then compassed with a wall, which the Ætolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Naxos; the Latines, Insula. He with his Corinthians having overcome the Sicili, drove them up into the Country; and after a few years, their multitude increasing, they added unto the City of the Island, that of Acradina, Tyca, and Neapolis. So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of as many ships, as any Haven of that part of Europe, as by the fertility of the soil, Syracus grew up in great haste, to be one of the goodliest Towns of the world. In short time the Greeks did possess the better part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselves into the fasts and mountainous parts of the Island, making their Royal residence in Trinacria.

Some seven years after the arrival of Archias, the Chalcidians, encouraged by the success of the Corinthians, did assail, and obtain the City of Leontium, built and possessed by the Sicili. In brief, the Greeks win from the Sicili, and their Associates, the Cities of Catania and Hybla, which in honour of the Megarians that forc't it, they called Megara.

About five and forty years after Archias had taken Syracus; Antiphebus, and Entimius, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Army into Sicil, and built Gela, whose Citizens, one hundred and eighty years after, did erect that magnificent and renowned City of Agrigentum, governed according to the Laws of the Dorians.

The Syracusians also, in the seventieth year after their Plantation, did set up the City of Acra, in the Mountains; and in the ninetieth year Castanea, in the Plains adjoining; and again in the hundred and thirtieth year of their dwelling in Syracus, they built Camerina: and soon after that, Enna, in the very Centre of the Island. So did the Cumani about the same time, recover from the Sicili the City of Zancle, which they had founded in the straight between Sicil and Italy. They of Zancle, had been the founders of Himera.

Not long after this, Dorians the Lacedæmonian built Heracleia; which the Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the neighbourhood of the Spartans, soon after invaded and ruined, though the same were again ere long re-edified.

Selinus also was built by a Colony of Megara: and Zancle was taken by the Messenians; who having lost their own Country, gave the name thereof unto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest Cities in this Island.

t. III.

III.
of the Government and Affairs of Sicil before Dionysius his Tyranny.

The most part of the Cities in Sicil, were governed by the rule of the people, till such time as Phalaris began to usurp the state of Agrigentum, and to exercise all manner of Tyranny therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable Engine, gave an hollow Bull of Brass, wherein to inclose men, and scorch them to death: praising the device with this commendation: That the noise of one tormented therein, should be like unto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gave a due reward to the Inventor; by causing the first trial to be made upon himself. He reigned one and thirty years, faith Eusebius; others give him but sixteen: Howsoever it were, one Telemachus in the end, fell upon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, even whilst the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confess some matter of conspiracy.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their liberty, and enjoyed it long, till Thero usurped the Government of the Common-weal: at which time also Phanias made himself Lord of Leontium; and Cleander of Gela: but Cleander having ruled seven years, was slain by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his Brother Hippocrates succeeded in his room, and greatly assisted the people of Naxos; of Zancle, of Messena, and of Leontium; whom with divers others of the ancient Inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made war with the Syracusians, and, in the end, got from them by composition, the City of Camerina. But when he had reigned seven years, he was slain in a Battle against the Sicili, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their form of Government, from Popular to Aristocratical; a preparation towards a Principality, whereinto it was soon after changed. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans, had long before, among other of the Greeks, seated themselves in Sicil.) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former War, with notable success, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed unto him by Hippocrates over his children, and being in possession of Gela, took the occasion and advantage of a contention in Syracus, between the Magistrates and the People. For coming with a strong Army to the succour of the Governours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, (and indeed) the most famous, that ever governed the Syracusians. This change happened in the second year of the threecore and twelfth Olympiad; wherein the better to establish himself, he took to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also usurped the state of Agrigentum.

Now this Gelon, the Son of Dinomenes, had three Brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus: to the first of which he gave up the City of Gela, when he had obtained the Principality of Syracus. For, after that time, all his thoughts travelled in the strengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracus. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracus. The Megarians that had moved a War against him, he overcame; the richer sort he brought unto Syracus; and the people he sold for slaves. In like manner dealt he with other places upon the like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrigentines, having dispossessed Terillus of his City Himera; the Carthaginians were drawn into the quarrel by Anaxicles, Lord of Messena, Father-in-law to Terillus; and Gelon was also solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after divers conflicts, the Carthaginians and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were overthrow by Gelon: and an hundred and fifty thousand of them left their bodies in Sicil.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedæmonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Army past the Hellespont. He, for their relief having armed thirty thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused nevertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the command of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or Land. So heuled to their Embassadors only this Saying, That their Spring was withered; accounting the Army, by him prepared, to be the very flower of the Greek Nation.

The Carthaginians, after this great loss received, fearing the invasion of their own Country, sent to Gelon by their Embassadors, to desire peace, who grants it them on these conditions: That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their children to Saturn; That they should pay him two thousand

* Syracus, as Cicero relates, was the greatest, and most goodly City of all that the Greeks possess; for the first mention is both strong, and of an excellent prospect from every entrance, by Land, or Sea. The Port (was for the most part) environed with beautiful buildings; and that part which was without the City, was on both sides banked up, and sustained with beautiful walls of Marble. The City of it self was one of the greatest of the World: for it had in compass (as Strabo reports) without the triple wall thereof, a hundred and eighty furlongs, which make of our miles about eighteen. It was compounded of four Cities (Strabo faith of five) to wit, Tyndaris, Acradina, Tyca, and Neapolis: of which greatest the ruins and foundations of the walls do yet witness. After such times as the Doria of Pericles had driven out the Sicilians, this goodly City for a long time became the seat of Tyrants. The first whereof was Gelo: The second, Hiero the elder: The third, Thrasybulus: The fourth and fifth, Dionysius the elder, and younger: The sixth, Diis: The seventh, Agathocles: The eighth, Pyrrhus: The ninth, Hiero the younger: The tenth and last, Hieronymus; who being slain at Leontium, at length the Romans conquered it under the conduct of Marcellus.

thousand talents of silver, and present him with two armed ships, in sign of amity. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for war, they sent unto Demarata, Gelon's Wife, a Crown, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The wars ended, and Sicily in peace, Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloved and honoured of his Subjects, he left the world, and left for his successor his Brother Hiero. Philistus and Pliny report, That when his body was burnt, according to the custom of that Age, a Dog of his, which always waited on him, ran into the fire, and suffered himself to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his Brother succeeded; a man rude, cruel, covetous, and so suspicious of his Brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus, as he fought by all means to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this, by the conversation which he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the study of good Arts. Divers quarrels he had, as well with Theron of Agigentium, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gave a notable overthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicily, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aid the Grecians against him. He also overthrew in battle Thrasydæus, the Son of Theron, and thereby restored the Agigentines to their former liberty. But in the end, he lost the love of the Syracussians; and after he had reigned eleven years, he left the Kingdom to his Brother Thrasybulus, who became a most unjust and bloody Tyrant. Thrasybulus enjoyed his Principality no longer than ten months. For, notwithstanding the force of mercenary Souldiers; which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acadina, he restored the Government, and was banished the Island. From whence he failed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locians.

And now had the Syracussians recovered again their former liberty, as all the rest of the Cities did; after which they had never fought, had the Successors of Gelon inherited his virtue, as they did the Principality of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the preservation ought to answer the acquisition. When a liberal, valiant, and advised

Prince, hath obtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his own, or exalted himself from being a private man to the dignity of a Prince, it behooveth the Successor to maintain it by the same way and art, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blows, ere that she could cleanse her self of the creatures and lovers of Gelon) was now again become Mistress of her self, and held her self free, well near three score years, to the time of Dionysius, though he were in the mean while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her own, called Tindario.

Now, to prevent the greatness of any one among them, for the future, they devised a kind of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking pattern from the Athenian Ostracisme. They called this their new devised judgement of exile, Petalidism, wherein every one wrote upon an Olive-leaf (as at Athen: they wrote upon shells) the name of him, whom he would have expelled the City. He that had most suffrages against him, was banished for five years. Hereby in a short time, it came to pass that those of judgement, and best able to govern the Common-weal, were, by the worst able, either suppressed, or thrust out of the City. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could, seeking some place of more security, wherein to maintain themselves. And good reason they had to do so; seeing that there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerful and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not very long. For their necessity taught them to abolish it, and restore again the wiser sort unto the Government; from which, the Nobility having practised to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducettius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Island (who had already taken Enna, and some other of the Grecian Cities, and overthrown the Army of the Agargentines) the Syracussians sent forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Bolcon. This their Captain made nothing so much haste to find out Ducettius, against whom he was employed, as he did to flee from the Army he led, as soon as Ducettius presented him battle. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracussians perished.

But making better choice among those whom they had banished, they levy other troops: by whom, in conclusion, Ducettius being being beaten, submitted himself, and is constrained to leave the Island for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned again, and built the City Colaitina on the Sea-side.

Ducettius being dead; all the Greek Cities did in a fort acknowledge Syracuse, Trinacria excepted; which also by force of Arms, in the four score and fifth Olympiad, they brought to reason.

But they do not long enjoy this their Superintendency. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppressed by them, seek aid from the Athenians; about the sixth year of the Peloponnesian War. In this suit they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, under the leading of Laches, and Charwoodes. To this Fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captains, they invaded the Territories of the Syracussians, and their Partisans; wan and lost divers places; took Messana; and, in the seventh year of the Peloponnesian War, lost it again. They also at the same time attempted Hymera, but in vain. The fire of this quarrel took hold upon many Cities, which did invade each others Territory with great violence. But when they had wearied themselves on all hands, and yet could see none issue of the War, the Leontines, without the advice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracussians, and were admitted into their society, with equal freedom. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatness themselves in Sicily, by the division and civil War, were disappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and fain to be gone with the broken remainder of their Fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custom of popular Estates) by taking revenge upon their own Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and laid an heavy fine upon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable War, that ever was made by the Greeks in Sicily; which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines and Syracussians, in favour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppressed the Egestans; and they of Syracuse the Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the War. For the Athenians undertook the protection of their old friends: and, in hatred of the Athenians, aid from Lacedaemon was sent to the Syracussians. The Lacedaemonians dealt plainly, having none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to help a people of their own Tribe, that craved their succour, being in distress. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were so great, as discovered their intent to be none other, than the Conquest of the whole Island. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their own passions, that they would not believe their own eyes; which presented unto them a Fleet and Army, far greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the City of Athen engaged all her power; as regarding not only the greatness of the enterprise, but the necessity of finishing it in a short space of time. For the Lacedaemonians (as hath already been shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken terms of peace with Athen, as differed not much from open War. Wherefore it was thought necessary, either to spare cost in this great Expedition, or altogether to forbear it: which was likely to be hindered by Wars at home, if their proceedings were slack abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians been over-passionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstain from so chargeable a business, and to reserve their forces for a more needful use. But young counsels prevailed against the authority of ancient men, that were more regardful of safety than of honour.

Of this business, mention hath been already made, in that which we have written of the Peloponnesian War. But what was there delivered in general terms, as not concerning the affairs of Greece, otherwise than by consequence, doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicily was like to have felt a great conversion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chief Commanders therein.

These had commission and direction, as well to succour the Sagessans, and to re-establish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracussians; as also by force of Arms, to subvert the Syracussians, and all their adherents in Sicily, and compel them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the forenamed Captains were sent off, with an hundred and thirty Gallies, and five thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirty ships of burden, which transported their virtuals, engines, and other munitions for the War: and these were Athenians, Mantineans, Rhodiens, and Candians: there were, besides these, six thousand Megarians light-armed, with thirty horsemen.

With these troops and fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegiens refuse to give them entry; but sell them virtuals for their money. From thence they sent to the Egeffians, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the war, seeing for their sakes they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answers, that these Egeffians were poor, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false shews of gold, having in all but 30. talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegiens, their ancient friends, and allied unto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their Walls. Hereupon Nicias adviseth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or persuade them to an agreement with the Egeffians; as likewise to see what disbursements the Egeffians could make; and so return again into Greece, and not to waite Athens in a needless war. Alcibiades, on the other side, would solicit the Cities of Sicily to confederacy against the Syracussians and Selinuntines, whereby to force them unto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus he persuades them to assail Syracuse it self, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they surprize Catana: and there they take new counsel how to proceed. Thence they employed Nicias to those of Egeffa, who received from them thirty talents towards his charges; and one hundred and twenty talents more there were of the spoils they had gotten in the Island. Thus the Summer being spent in idle consultations, and vain attempts, the Athenians prepare to assail Syracuse. But Alcibiades having been accused at home, in his absence, was sent for back by the Athenians to make his answer: and the Army was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtain a landing place very near unto Syracuse, by this device.

They imply to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him, to promise unto the Syracussians, that he would deliver into their hands all the Athenians within Catana. Hereupon the Syracussians draw thither ward with their best forces. But in the mean while, the Athenians, setting sail from Catana, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at fair ease, and fortifie themselves against the Town. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracussians had the loss: but the Athenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victory to any great effect. They then retire themselves, with a resolution to refresh their Army at Catana, for the winter season. From thence they made an attempt upon Messana, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vain. For Alcibiades had discovered such as were Traitors within the City to the Messanians. This he now did, in despite of his own Citizens, the Athenians; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to have put him to death, or to have banished him: whereof being allured by his friends, he took his way towards the Lacedemonians, and to them he gave mischievous counsel against his Country. While this winter yet lasted, the Syracussians send Embassadors to Lacedemon, and Corinth, for aid: as likewise the Athenian Captains in Sicily, send to Athens for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth year of the Peloponnesian war) the Athenians in Sicily sail from the Port of Catana to Megara, forsaken of the Inhabitants; from whence, foraging the Country, they obtain some small victories over the stragling Syracussians: and at their return to Catana, they receive a supply of two hundred men at arms, but without horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Island from the Segessians, and other their adherents: they were also strengthened with a company of Archers, and with three hundred talents in money.

Hereupon they take courage, and incamp near Syracuse, upon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracussians, that failed to impeach their intrenchments. They also received from their Confederates four hundred horse-men, with two hundred other horse, to mount their men at arms. Syracuse was now in effect blockt up, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians receive divers losses; among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slain.

In the mean while, Gylippus and Pytho, with the Lacedemonian and Corinthian forces, arrive, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, joyn with them; so that with these and his own troops, Gylippus adventured to march over-land toward Syracuse. The Syracussians send a part of their forces to meet him and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arrival arrival near unto the City upon a place of advantage. At the first encounter they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusan horse-men could not come to fight in those straits: but soon after, Gylippus charging them again, brake them, and constrained Nicias to fortifie himself within his Camp. Whereupon Nicias made the state of his affairs known, by his letters to the Athenians; shewing, that without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be lost, together with the small Army remaining. These letters received, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Eurymedon and Demofthenes, to joyn with Nicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supplies; the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the mean while, Gylippus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians both by Sea and Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good success: but in conclusion, he took from their Fort, near unto Syracuse, the Promontory called Phymnigrum; wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their provisions. Notwithstanding which loss, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Lacedemonians; yet were they most obtinate in prosecuting the War in Sicily, and dispatched away Demofthenes with new succours. Demofthenes, in his way towards Sicily, encountered with Polyarchus the Corinthian, with his fleet: both the Captains being bound for Sicily, the one to succour Nicias, the other Gylippus. The loss between them was in effect equal; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arrived to either, Gylippus and Arifon had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demofthenes arrived with threecore and thirteen Gallies, charged with footmen; and (blaming the sloath of Nicias) he invaded the Syracussians the same day that he arrived. But he made more haste than he had good speed, being shamefully beaten, and repulsed with great loss. Hereupon Demofthenes and Eurymedon determine to rise up from before Syracuse, and return to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to the contrary, pretending that he had good intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned, that the Town could not long hold out.

Whatsoever Nicias his intelligence was; upon the arrival of a new supply into the Town, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipse of the Moon, boding (as was thought) ill success, caused them to defer their departure. But this superstition cost them dear. For the Syracussians, Lacedemonians, and Corinthians, with threecore and seventeen sail of Gallies, entred the great Port of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and whereon they had fortified themselves. The Athenians in the same Port encountered them with fourcore and six Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon: in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the lesser number, and Eurymedon slain. Now, though it were so, that the Syracussians received the more loss by land (for the fight was general) yet when the Athenians were beaten by sea, in which kind they thought themselves invincible, they were wonderfully cast down. For it was well said of Gylippus; to the Syracussians; When any people do find themselves vanquished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they persuade themselves that they exceed all others, they not only lose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies sunk and wrackt, had seventeen taken, and posselt by the enemy: and with great labour and loss they defended the rest from being fired, having drawn them within a Palisado, in one corner of the port, unadvisedly: for it is as contrary to a Sea-war, to thrust ships into a straight room and corner, as it is to scatter foot in a plain field against horse; the one subsisting by being at large, the other by close imbatailing.

The Syracussians, having now weakened the Athenian fleet, resolve to imprison them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a mile over, and there they came to Anchor; filling the out-let with all manner of Vessels; which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies break through the Syracusan fleet; which lay but single, because they were forced to range themselves over all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore not only mored themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and lay behind them again certain ships, which served in the former war for virtuals: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were sunk; or the chain, which joyned them to their fellows, broken; the Athenians might yet find themselves a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on on in form of a wedge, to break through, and force a passage, the Syracussians had left within these Gallies and Ships, chained together, a certain number of loose ones, to stop their course and fury. For where the way of any vessel, using oar or sails, is broken, and their speed foretold, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the resistance opposing.

On the other side, the Athenians knew that they were utterly lost, except with an invincible resolution they could make their way, and break down this great bridge of boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they resolve to hazard, with all their shipping (to the number of one hundred and ten of all forts) and with all the strength of their Land-army, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did so disorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as albeit some few of them had broken through the chains, yet being stopp'd with the ships without, and assailed by other loose Gallies of the Syracussians, which were purposely left at large in the sea, they were either taken or sunk. Three great disadvantages the Athenians had: the first, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a freight, they had no room to turn themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the second, that having overperterbed their Gallies with Souldiers, who used offensive arms of darts and slings, they had not place upon the decks to stretch their arms; the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a passage, by which they might save themselves by running away. To be short, the fight was no less terrible than the confusion: the slaughter great on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, so low and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as survived, were beaten back to the Land, with loss of three-score of their Gallies, broken, sunk, or abandoned. The Syracussians did also lose twenty of theirs, with Pythons, Commander of the Corinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottom of the Port, saved themselves by the help and countenance of the Land-army there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders go to counsel. Demofthenes persuades them to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracussians were triumphing, and made secure by their present victory, to set upon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to return to Athens. This was no ill counsel. For, as we have heard of many great Captains (yea, the greatest number of all that have been victorious) that have neglected the speedy prosecution of a beaten enemy; so might we produce many examples of those, who having slept securely in the bosome of good success, have been suddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Army, and have thereby lost again all the honour and advantage formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the advice of Demofthenes: Others say, that the Seamen were against it. Whereupon abandoning over land to the Cities of their Confederates, till some more favourable fortune should call them thence. On the other side, Gylippus, and other the Lacedemonian and Corinthian Captains, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracussians to put themselves presently into the field, and to stop all the passages, leading to those Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retreat. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in some of our Commanders at Cadez, lost us both the Indian fleet, and the spoils of many other neighbour places. Hermocrates, the Syracusan, finding it a lost labour, to persuade his Countrymen to any hasty prosecution, devised this good stratagem, whereby to gain time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, he should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to find Nicias, and (after they had assured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to give him advice not to march away over-hastily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alledging that the Syracussians had lodged their Army, which could not long stay there, upon the passages and places of advantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These tidings Nicias easily believed, and put off his journey to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearful than wise; and to them, every thistle in the field appears, by night, a man at arms.

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remove; being pierced and pursued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were sick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies' swords. The rest march away, to the number of forty thousand; and make their first passage by force, over the River of Anapus, notwithstanding the opposition of their enemies, mies. But being every day charged in their marches, and by the Syracusan horse-men, beaten in from foraging and provision of food, they grow weak and heartless. The Syracussians also possess the Mountain Lepas, by which they were to pass towards Camarina, and thereby force them to fall back again towards the Sea-coast, and to take what way they could: being unable to proceed in their journey intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and blind marches by night; which they were fain to endure, as having none other means to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continual skirmishing. To keep all in order, Nicias undertook the leading of the Vanguard; and Demofthenes conducted the Rear. At the River Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march; leaving Demofthenes to make the retreat: who being incompassed, and overpert with numbers, in the end renders himself. The conditions he obtained, were far better than he could have hoped for; and the faith of his enemies far worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias murdered in prison. The Army of Demofthenes being dissolved, they pursued Nicias with the greater courage: who being utterly broken upon the passage of the River Asinarus, rendered himself to Gylippus, upon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to preserve him, and to have had the honour to have brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble Enemy to the Lacedemonians, and who, at the overthrow which they received at Pylos by the Athenians, had saved the lives of the vanquished; Demofthenes, as one that had done to Lacedemonians the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusan Army disswayed the rest, by all the art he had, from using any barbarous violence, after so noble a victory. But the cruel and cowardly sort, (cowardise and cruelty being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these brave Captains to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be starved in loathsome prisons; and the rest, sold for slaves. This was the success of the Sicilian war: which took end at the River Asinarus, the four and twentieth day of May, in the fourscore and eleventh Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicily; the Egeffians (for whose defence against the Selinuntines, this late war had been taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracussians, sought help from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselves, and their City, as their vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicily, yet considering the prosperity of the Syracussians, and their late victories over the Athenians, they stayed while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse or accept the offer made unto them: for the Selinuntines were straightly allied to the Syracussians, as may appear by what is said. In the end the Senators of Carthage resolve upon the enterprise; and (by a trick of their Punic wit) to separate the Syracussians from the Selinuntines, they send Embassadors to Syracuse: praying that City, as in the behalf of the Egeffians, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should think meet to allow them. The Syracussians approved the motion; for it tended to their own honor. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they took it ill, that the Syracussians, with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in a business that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would have it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace crave aid of Syracuse; and the Syracussians as ill grant it unto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrament, which the Carthaginians would have put into their hands. Hereupon, an Army of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, under the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you have heard before) was overthrown with the great Carthaginian Army at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this employment, that he might take revenge as well of his Uncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of them having been slain by the Himerians, the other by those of Selinus. Both the Cities, Hannibal, in this war, won by force of arms, sack them, and burnt them; and having taken three thousand of the Himerians prisoners, he caused them to be led unto the place, where Amilcar was slain, and buried them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of Hermocrates, who had lately been General of the Syracusan forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so far prevailed with the ingrateful multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meek virtue, at such a time as he was aiding the Lacedemonians, in their war against Athens: wherein he did great service. All the honest sort within Syracuse were sorry for their injury injury done unto him, and fought to have him repealed. Hermocrates himself, returning into Sicily, gathered an Army of six thousand; with which he began to repair Selinus; and by many noble actions laboured to win the love of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore he was advised to seize upon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; whereby his friends within the Town, might have the better means to rise against the adverse party. This he did: but presently the multitude fell to arms, and set upon him; in which conflict he was slain. But his Son-in-law, Dionysius, shall make them with Hermocrates alive again.

t. IV.

Of Dionysius the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuse.

THe Syracusians had enjoyed their liberty about threecore years, from the death of Thrasybulus, to the death of Hermocrates; at which time Dionysius was raised up by God, to take revenge, as well of their cruelty toward strangers, as of their ingratitude towards their own best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their pastime, to reward the virtue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or disgrace; which custom they must now be taught to amend.

Dionysius obtained the principality of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselves masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse it self. For, being made Tyrant, and commanding their Armies against the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaved himself so well, that he got a general love among the people, and men of war. Then began he to follow the example of Pisistratus, that made himself Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of six hundred men, to defend his person: under pretence, that his private enemies, being traitorously affected to the State of Syracuse, had laid plots how to murder him, because of his good services. He doubled the pay of his Souldiers; alledging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to assure them to himself. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had been banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards at his devotion, as obliged unto him by so great a benefit. His first favour, among the Syracusians, grew from his accusation of the principal men. It is the delight of base people to reign over their betters: wherefore, gladly did he help them to break down, as fetters imprisoning their liberty, the bars that held it under safe custody. Long it was not, ere the chief Citizens had found whereat he aimed. But what they saw, the people would not see; and some that were needy, and knew not how to get Offices without his help, were willing to help him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the City to smart. He began early to hunt after the tyranny; being but five and twenty years of age when he obtained it: belike it was his desire to reign long. His first work, of making himself absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadel, wherein was much good provision, and under it the Gallies were moored. This he obtained by allowance of the people, and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himself without all shame or fear. The Army the chief Citizens restored by him from banishment; all the needy sort within Syracuse, that could not thrive by honest courses; and some neighbour-towns, bound unto him, either for his help in war, or for establishing the faction, reigning at that present; were wholly affected to his assistance. Having therefore gotten the Citadel into his hands, he needed no more, save to assure what he had already. He strengthened himself by divers marriages; taking first to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionysius, his Successor; the other, Arifomache, the daughter of Hipparchus, and sister to Dion, honourable men in Syracuse; which bare unto him many children, that served to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere some of the Syracusians (envying his prosperity) incited the multitude, and took arms against him, even in the novelty of his Rule. But their enterprise was more passionately, than wisely governed. He had shamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at arms; making them suspect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians waste all that he might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it inflamed them with a desire to free themselves from his tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syracuse, where they found friends to help them: there they forced his Palace, ransacked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wife, that for the grief thereof he poisoned her self. But he followed the heels apace; and firing a Gate of the City by night, entred soon enough to take revenge, by making a speedy riddance of them. For he spared none of his known, no nor of his suspected enemies. After that, he grew so doubtful of his life, as he never durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no not so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, unfripped and searched. He was the greatest Robber of the people that ever reigned in any State, and withall the most unrespectively cruel.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the City, called the Island, from the rest; like as the Spaniard did the Citadel of Antwerp: therein he lodged his Treasures, and his Guards.

He then began to make war upon the free Cities of Sicily: but while he lay before Herbessa, an in-land Town, the Syracusians rebelled against him; so, as with great difficulty he recovered his Citadel: from whence, having allured the old Souldiers of the Companions, who forced their passage through the City, with one thousand and two hundred horse, he again recovered the mastery over the Syracusians. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their harvest, he disarmed all the Townsmen remaining, and new strengthened the Fort of the Island, with a double wall. He inclosed that part also, called Epipolæ, which, with threecore thousand labourers, he finished within three weeks, being two leagues in compass. He then built two hundred new Gallies; and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and forty thousand Targets, with as many Swords, and head-pieces, with fourteen thousand corselets, and all other futable arms. Which done, he sent word to the Carthaginians (greatly infeebled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greek Towns, which they held in Sicily, he would make war upon them: and, not staying for answer, he took the spoil of all the Phœnician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second did of our English, before the war in our late Queens time. He then goes to the field with fourscore thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with two hundred Gallies, and five hundred ships of burden. Most of the Towns which held for Carthage yielded unto him; saving Panormum, Segesta or Egesta, Ancyræ, Motya, and Entella. Of these, he first wan Motya by assault, and put all therein to the sword; but before Egesta he lost a great part of his Army, by a fall of the Citizens. In the mean while Himilco arrives; but, ere he took land, he lost in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fifty ships of war, and five thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwithstanding, he recovered again Motya upon his first descent. From thence marching towards Messana, he took Lipara, and (soon after) Messana, and razed it to the ground. Now began Dionysius greatly to doubt his estate. He therefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territory of the Leontines, by which he supposed that Himilco would pass toward Syracuse; and he himself took the field again, with four and thirty thousand foot; and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himilco had divided his Army into two parts, marching with the one half over-land, and sending Magas with the other by Sea: he sent Leptines, his brother to encounter Magas. But Leptines was utterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twenty thousand of his men were slain, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authors tell us; that One City should be able to furnish five hundred sail of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracuse arm in this war) and more strange it is, that in a battail at Sea, without any great Artillery, or Musket-shot, twenty thousand should be slain in one fight. In all our fights against the Turks, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, we hear of no such number lost; nor in any other fight by Sea, that ever happened in our age, nor before us. When Charles the fifth went to besiege Algier, he had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fifty sail of ships, and threecore and five Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, he sought help from all the Cities and ports of Spain, Naples, and the rest of Italy. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the field, upon extremity, as many as were needfull, of all that could bear arms, giving them little wages, or other allowance: in our dayes it is not so; neither indeed, is it often requisite. Upon this overthrow, Dionysius posits away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himilco follows him, and besiegeth the Town by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, having received aid from the Lacedæmonians, under the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himself to Sea, to make provision for his Citizens, who, in his absence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sink four. Hereupon, finding their own success pro-

perous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill, having alio at the present weapons in their hands, they consult how to recover their liberty. And this they had done, had not Pharicles the Lacedæmonian resisted them. It also fell out to his exceeding advantage, that the plague was so increased, and so violent among the Carthaginians, as it is said, that above an hundred thousand of them died thereof. He therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets upon them both by Sea and Land; and having slain great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to desire peace. This peace Dionysius sold him for so great sum of money; on condition, that he should fleet away with his Carthaginians only: which he safely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was pursued, and left many of his Carthaginians behind him. The rest of the Africans fell under the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while bravely defended themselves, were (after their submission) entertained, and served the Conquerour.

May such examples of perfidious dealing I have noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliver unto memory the like practices, when they meet with their matches: That which hapned unto Monsieur de Piles, was very suitable to this treachery, wherewith Dionysius pursued Himilco. I was present when De Piles related the injury done unto him. He had rendred S. John d'Angelle to the French King Charles IX. who believed him therein. He rendred it, upon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safety, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himself, of the Duke of Anjou his Brother, General of his Army, of the Queen Mother, and of divers Dukes and Marshalls of France, he was set upon and broken in his March; spoiled of all that he had, and forced to save his life by flight; leaving the most of his Souldiers dead upon the place; the Kings hand and faith warranting him to march away with ensignes dispaired and withall his goods and provisions, no whit availing him. It needs not therefore seem strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus break his faith, since Kings, professing Christianity, are bold to do the like, or command their Captains to do it for them.

Dionysius after this great victory, took care to re-edifie Messina. Mago who stayed in Sicily, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, is again beaten by Dionysius; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supply of fourscore thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to Mago, but these take eggs for their money, and make peace with Dionysius, leaving the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves: whom Dionysius, after a long siege, overcame, and gave their City to the mercenary Souldiers.

He then past into Italy, obtained divers victories there, brought the Rhegiens on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred and fourscore thousand crowns, to furnish him with threecore Gallies, and put in an hundred pledges, for assurance of their future observance of covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to perform unto them the peace that they had so dearly bought; but that having taken from them their Gallies, he might besiege them, and ruine them utterly, with the more ease. Now to the end he might not, without some colour, falsifie the faith that he had given to them; he pretended to want victual for his Army, at such time as he seemed ready to depart out of Italy, and sent to them to furnish him therewith, promising to return them the like quantity at his coming home to Syracuse.

His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, he would then make their refusal the cause of his quarrel: if they yielded to aid him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of food, to endure a siege any long time against him. For, to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price soever. And great reason he had to take revenge of them, if he had done it fairly, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his reign, he desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobility upon him for a wife; they answered, that they had not any one fit for him, save the Hangmans daughter. Princes do rather pardon ill deeds, than villainous words. Alexander the great forgave many sharp swords, but never any sharp tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errors. And certainly, it belongs to those that have warrant from God; to reprehend Princes; and to none else, especially in publick.

It is said, that Henry the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his over-bold and biting taunts, than he used against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracy with the Spaniard or Savoyan: for he had pardoned 10000. of such as had gone farther, & drawn their swords against him. The contemptuous tuous words that Sir John Parrot used of our late Queen Elizabeth, were his ruines; and not the counterfetter of the Romish Priest produced against him. So flared it with some other greater than he; that thereby ran the same, and a worse fortune, soon after.

To be short, he made them know new bread from old. He assaulted their Town on all sides, which he continued to do eleven months. Till he won it by force. He used his victory without mercy, especially against Phylax, who had continued with him.

Some other wars he made with the Carthaginians; after the taking and razing of this City; and those with variable success. For; as in one encounter he slew Mago, with ten thousand Africans: so the son of Mago beat him; and slew his brother Leptines, with fourteen thousand of his Souldiers. After which he bought his peace of the Carthaginians; as they had formerly done of him; following therein the advice of Prosperity and Adversity, as at Kings and States do.

When he had reigned eight and thirty years, he died: some say in his bed; peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruel man he was, and a faithles; a great Doer, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyranny, he gave order to have him slain, or sold for a slave. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore stiled his cruelty, The hate of evil men; and his lawles slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his justice. True it is, that flatterers are a kind of vermine, which poison all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worstest and valiantest men do: and I wonder not at it, for it is a world: and as our Saviour Christ hath told us, The World will love him.

To this Dionysius his son of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his Kingdom and his Vices. To win the love of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt up and condemned. Withall, he remitted unto his Citizens divers payments, by his Father imposed upon them: Which done, and thereby hoping that he had fastned unto himself the peoples affections; he cast off the sheeps skin, and put on that of the wolf. For being jealous of his own Brethren, as men of more vertue than himself, he caused them all to be slain; and all the kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath been said) had two Wives, Doris of Loeris, and Artemacha a Syracusan, the latter of Dionysius which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded unto him; and by Artemacha he had two sons and two Daughters of which the elder, called Sophrosyne, he gave in marriage to his eldest son, and her half brother Dionysius; the younger, called Arta, he bestowed on his Brother Thebriades: after whose death Dion took her to wife, being his Niece.

This Dion a just and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue; and that he was wholly given over to sensuality, prevailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had been, as he drew him into Sicily, to instruct the young King. And having perswaded the King to entertain him; he wrought so well with him, as Dionysius began to change condition; to change Tyranny into Monarchy: and to hold the Principality that he had, rather by the love of his people, and his National Laws, than by the violence of his Guards and Garisons. But this goodness of his lasted not long. For Plinius the Historian, and other his Parasites, that hated Dionysius severity; wrought him out of the Tyrants favour, and caused him soon after to be banished out of Sicily, to the great grief of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels between him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great fear; or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fifty Gallies at his own charge, during the war against them; his enemies found means, by sinister interpretation, to convert his good will into matter of Treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, given of Plato, had tended to none other end, than to soften his mind, and to make him neglect his own affairs, by the study of Philosophy; whilst Dion in the mean time having furnished fifty Gallies under colour of the Kings service, had it in his own power either to deliver to the Syracusians their former liberty, or to make himself Lord and Sovereign of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberal offer which he made, to serve the King with so great a preparation, at his own charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had served the King for none other end than to raise and enrich themselves, and had already been raised & enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceive it aright. But the covetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring that Dion had, were bold to rile his Love and Liberality, Pride and Presumption; and heartned the young King in his oppressing, and eating up his own people, of whose spoils they themselves shared no small portion. I have heard it, That when Charls the fifth had the repulse at Algier, in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the bravest men that ever Spain brought forth, offered unto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his own charge: But he had never good day after it. For they that envied his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the West-Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese sought to value himself above him; and to have it said, that what the Emperour could not, Cortese had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented at first to send him the revenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moveables at his own pleasure: not without giving hope to recall him in short time. Had he continued in this good mood, like enough it is, that Dion would have been well pleased to live well, as he did, at Athena. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-sale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby urged him to take another course, even to seek the restitution of his Country to liberty. The virtues of Dion, especially his great Liberality, had purchased much Love in Greece. This Love made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: but it stood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men, with whose help he might return into Sicily. Yet he got not above eight hundred (for he carried the matter closely) to follow him in his adventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needfull, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicily, marched to Syracuse, entered the City without resistance, armed the multitude, and won all, save the Citadel.

Dionysius was then absent in Italy but he quickly had advertisement of his dangerous accident. Wherefore he returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vain treaties of Peace, and some forcible attempts to recover the Town, he was fain to depart, leaving yet a Cattle to the Custody of Apollocrates his eldest Son. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philius, coming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Countries liberty, had the same reward that all worthy men have had from popular Estates: He was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the City. He retired himself to the Leontines, who received him with great joy. Soon after his departure from Syracuse, new troops entered the Castle: they fall out, assail, spoil, and burn a great part of the City. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere he could arrive, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Towns-men thinking themselves secure, shut the gates against Dion. But the next night they of the Castle fall out again, with greater fury than ever; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Town. In this their extremity Dion comes the second time to their succour: the love of his Country surmounting all the injuries that he had received. He sets upon the Garrison of the Castle, with the one part of his Army; and quencheth the fire every where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had well near burnt all, and depopulated Syracuse, he recovered the Castle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollocrates after Dionysius his Father into Italy. But their malice, of whom he had best deserved, and whom he had loved most, gave an untimely end to his days. For he was soon after his victory, murdered by Gylippus; who after he had with ill success, awhile governed Syracuse, was slain with the same Dagger, with which he had murdered Dion.

Ten years after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italy, recovers his estate; and returns to Syracuse, driving Nysus thence, whom he found Governour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing more than ever, his cruelty, flee to Icetes, a Syracusan born, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into confederacy with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not only to prevail against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusans towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their City. The Syracusans, being deservedly afflicted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Icetes also sends thither, and dissuades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the business. He tells them, by his Messengers, That he had entered into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land an Army in Sicily. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Icetes, more enraged than dissuaded, sent Timoleon with nineteen Gallies, to deliver Syracuse from tyranny. In the mean while, Icetes had entered Syracuse, and with the help of the Carthaginians, driven Dionysius into the Castle, where he besieged him.

Icetes, being himself a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than how to deliver his Country. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to return his Fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicily. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium, whose Captains advised Timoleon to get him gone in peace. They had far more Gallies there than he had; and were like to compel him, if he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himself over-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captains, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliver unto him those arguments for his return, which they had used to him in private; that he might, by publick testimony, discharge himself to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victory obtained by a few fair words, was without loss, and far more easie, than that of many blows, and wounds, yielded to Timoleon desire. But while the Orations were delivering, Timoleon, favoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the press; and having set sail, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, where surprising Icetes his Army, he slew a part thereof, and put the rest to run. It is the nature of victory to beget friends. The Adramitans joyned with him, and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yield up himself, and the places which he could not defend, unto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who, within fifty days after his arrival, had recovered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to live there a private man, was still invaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Icetes. For he besieged the Corinthians within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vain) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send unto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are stayed in Italy by foul weather. Icetes is strengthened with threecore thousand Afficans, brought unto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fifty Gallies, to keep the Port. This was the first time that ever the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that City. With this great Army Icetes assaileth the Castle Timoleon sends them victuals; and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Icetes do therefore resolve to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captain of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Castle, and took that part of Syracuse, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the mean while, the two thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marched toward Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Icetes being frightened out of Sicily (which he might easily have conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him return to Carthage, where the general exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for fear of further punishment he hanged himself. Timoleon enters the City, and beats down the Castle (which he called The Nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the City, when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feed on the grafs growing in the Market-place. Therefore he writes to Corinth for people to re-inhabit it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece, many come from Italy; others from other parts of the Island.

But a new storm ariseth. Asdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Lithium, with threecore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their provisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither; and chargeth this great Army upon the passage of a River.

A tempest of rain, hail, and lightning, with boysterous winds, beating upon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are utterly broken, ten thousand slain, five thousand taken, with all their carriages and provisions: among which there were found a thousand Corlets guilt and graven. After this, Timoleon gave an overthrow to Icetes, and following his victory, took him, with his Son Eupolemus, and the General of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be slain: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruelty) he suffered Icetes his wives and daughters to be put to death. But this was the revenge of God upon Leates; who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arctus, Dion's wife, and a young child of his, with Arifomache his Sister, to be cast into the Sea.

Holo again prevailed against Mamercus Tyrant of Catana; and won Catana itself. Mamercus fled to Hippom Tyrant of Messina; but Timoleon, pursued him, won the Town; delivering Hippom to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all other the Tyrants in Sicily.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition that they should not pass the River of Lycus. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syracusans, till his death; and was solemnly buried by them in the Market-place of their City: the day of his Funerals being for ever ordained to be kept holy among them.

After such time as Timoleon had delivered Syracuse from the tyranny of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Island; the Inhabitants enjoyed their liberty in peace, about twenty years: The Cities and temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant failed in safety; and the Labouring man enjoyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to govern; nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings, to govern them; should any long time subsist.

Twenty years after the death of Timoleon, there started up one Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of base condition: who from a Beggar, to a common Soldier; from a Soldier to a Captain; and so from degree to degree, rising to be a Prætor: finally, became Lord and Sovereign of the Syracusans. Many fortunes he ran, and under-went as many dangers, ere he obtained the principality. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banished. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable service, as well for those by whom he was employed, as also for the Syracusans, and against them. For in their Wars against those of Enna, and the Campanians, he did them memorable service: and on the contrary, as memorable service for the Murgantines against the Syracusans. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made General of their forces, he sacked Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so straightly, that the Citizens were driven to crave aid, even from their ancient and natural enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians to relieve Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace between himself and the Syracusans; binding himself by promise and oath to remain a friend and servant to the State of Carthage: for ever after. Amilcar entertained the business, and compounded the quarrels between Agathocles and the Syracusans. Agathocles is chosen Prætor; he entertains five thousand Africans; and divers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, under colour of a purpose to besiege Enthia. With these, and with the assistance of the poor and discontented Syracusans (The City also being divided into many factions) he assails the Senators; kills all his enemies; and opposes; divides the spoil of the rich; among the poor; and gives liberty to his Souldiers, to rob, to ravish, and to murder; for two whole daies and nights, without controulment: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and strewed the streets with ten thousand dead carcases; besides those that had broken their necks over the walls; their fury had no further subject to work on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the people (being an eloquent knave) persuaded them, that, for the violent sickness, by which the Common-wealth was utterly consumed, he found no better than the violent remedies which he had administered: and that he affected no other thing than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchy, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democracy, by which it had been governed, from the first institution, with so great glory and posterity. This he did, to have the Crown clapt on his head (as it were) to perform. For, as he knew that he had left none living within the City, fit or able to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so he knew he right well, that all they which had assisted in the murder and spoil of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawless Lord, who had been partaker with them in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this table, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: again and again saluting and adoring him, by that name, as if he had been given to him by some lawful election. Hence had our King Richard the third a piece of his pattern; but the one was of base, the other of Kingly Parents; the one took liberty from a Common-wealth, the other sought only to succeed in a Monarchy; the one continued his cruelty to the end, the other, after he had obtained the Crown, sought, by making good Laws to recover the love of his people.

The life of this Tyrant is briefly written by

by Justinus; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus; the sum of whereof is this. The same Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him five thousand men to help in the Massacre of the Citizens, was also content to wink at many wrongs that he did unto the confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilcar, to settle Agathocles in his tyranny, and to let him vex and waste the whole Island; because it was thereby like to come to pass, that he should reduce all Sicily into such terms as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But when the Cities, confederate with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punic faith (so much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meer falshood) shewed it self very honourable in taking order for the redress. Embassadors were sent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in mind of his Covenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africa, and a new Captain appointed to succeed in his charge, with such forces, as might compel Agathocles to reason, if otherwise he would not hearken to it. All this tended to save their Confederates, from suffering such injuries in the future. For that which was past (since it could not be recalled) they took order to have it severely punished. Amilcar was accused secretly, and by way of scrutiny: the suffrages being given, but not calculated; and so reserved until he should return. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilcar had soon notice of it. In managing his business with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his own profit, as well as to the publick benefit of his Country. For he had made such a composition with the Syracusans, as gave him not only means to weaken others, but to strengthen himself, both in power and authority, even against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the custom of those, that hope to work their own ends by cunning practices, thinking to deal subtly and finely, they spin their threads so small, that they are broken with the very wind. Amilcar saw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deal substantially; and that therefore it would be hard for him, to make them follow his crooked devices: which if he could not do, it was to be expected, that their anger would break out into so much the greater extremity, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which some of his fore-goers had taught him; and, for fear of such a death as the Judges might award him, he ended his own life in what sort he thought best. This desperation of Amilcar served to inform Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resolved to get the start of them in action. He dissembled no longer; but, instead of spoil and robbery, made open War upon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicily his own, ere the Carthaginian Forces arrived: which thinking to have incouraged an ill-established Tyrant, found him ready, as a King, to defend his own, and give them sharp entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Navy was so Tempell-beaten, that they could neither do good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leave their business undone, and return into Africa.

The Carthaginians prepare a new Fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furnished was broken, by foul weather, and the best part of it cast away, even whilst it was yet within kenning of their City. But Amilcar, the Son of Gisco, gathering together the remainders of his shipwreck, was bold to pass over into Sicily, and landed not far from Gela, where Agathocles was soon ready to examine the cause of their coming. Many skirmishes passed between them, in which (commonly) the Syracusans had the better. But his good success begat presumptions; whereby he lost a battle more important than all the other fights. One adverse chance is enough to overthrow the state of a Tyrant, if it be not upheld by great circumspection. The War was soon transferred to the walls of Syracuse; within which Agathocles was closed up, and driven to make his last defence by their help, who may be judged to have loved him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuse, after that great Massacre of the principal men, made in the beginning of this new Tyranny, were (for the most part) such, as had been either mercenary Souldiers, enfranchised slaves, or base and needy people; helpers in establishing the present Government, and Executioners of the murders, and spoil committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were so well observed, and (withall) so fearful, that they durst not stir. But it was enough that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their City; Famine was likely to grow upon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessity Agathocles adventured upon a strange course, which the event commended as wise. He embarked as many as he thought meet, in those vessels that rode in the Haven; and committing the

the Government of the City to his Brother Antander, willed the People to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) he had bethought himself of a mean, both to raise the siege, and to repair all other losses. A Carthaginian Fleet lay in the mouth of the Haven, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keep the besieged from issuing forth.

Now, at such time as Agathocles was ready to depart, advertisement came, that many ships of burden, laden with Corn, and other provisions, were drawing near unto Syracuse. To intercept these the Carthaginians hoise sail, and lanch forth into the deep. They were not far gone, when they might behold Agathocles issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to give convey unto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheel about, and make amain toward him, as thinking him the better booty. Henceforth abode their coming, nor fled back into the City, but made all speed towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would give them light. In the mean season the victuallers were gotten to Syracuse; which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had unburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admiral perceived, first, that by pursuing two Fleets at once, he had mislead of them both; and secondly, that Agathocles returned not again, but was gone to seek his fortune elsewhere, he thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well upon them, that they should not have leisure to do mischief in some other part.

The Carthaginian Navy followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and overtook him after six dayes. He had (at the first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themselves in seeking their own misfortune: for he fought with them, and beat them; and, having sunk or taken many, drove the rest to flye which way they could; laden with such strange tydings of his voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discover unto them his project, letting them understand, that there was no better way to divert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the Ile of Sicily, than by bringing the war to their own doors. For here (said he) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take Arms against them, as soon as they perceive that there is an Army on foot, which desires to look upon their walls. Their Towns are ill fortified, their people untrained; and experienced in dangers; the mercenary forces that they levy in these parts, will rather follow us than them, if we offer greater wages than they can give: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them have some share with us in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can do, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked; as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many brave words encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reserving one or two to use as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remain, save only in victory. In this heat of resolution, they win by force two Cities; which after they had thoroughly sacked, they burnt to the ground: as a mark of terror to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Army destroyed in Sicily. This impression do dismayes them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea-fight, yet still they fear, and know not what. They suspect Amilcar's faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk; they suspect their principal Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage unto the enemy; they raise a great Army, and know not to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captains in the City, Hanno and Bomilcar, great enemies. And therefore the more unlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generals of the Army levied, which far exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it seldom happens, that dissention between Commanders produceth any fortunate event. Necessity drove Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deal with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victory against the one half of them. For Bomilcar would not stir, but suffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victory, brought over a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian society, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victory, winneth many Towns, and sends word to Syracuse of his good success. The Carthaginians also send unto Sicily, willing Amilcar, their General, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to be lost; whilst he was travelling in the Conquest of Sicily. Amilcar sends them five thousand men:

all his forces he thought it not needful to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles back into Sicily, than to be drawn home by one, that could scarce retain his own Kingdom. But these good hopes had a bad issue. He spent some time in winning a few Towns that adhered unto the Syracusians: and having brought his matters to some good order, he conceived a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surprize. It was a pretty (though tragical) Accident, if it were true, as Tully relates it. Amilcar had a dream which told him that he should slip the next day within Syracuse. His fancy begot this dream, and he verily believed it. He made more hast than good speed toward the City: and coming upon it on the sudden, had good hope to carry it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laid an ambush to entrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried prisoner into the City; in which it was likely that he had no great cheer to his supper: for they struck of his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present to Agathocles).

This good success of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Army, that Agathocles was bold to wear a Crown, and stile himself King of Africk. He had allured Ophellus, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliver the Country into his hands: for that (as is said) it was sufficient unto himself to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicily, wherein (after this war ended) he might reign quietly. Ophellus came with a great Army, and was friendly entertained. But the traitorous Sicilian, taking an advantage, did murder this his assistant; and afterwards by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenean Army to follow him in his Wars. Thus his villany found good success; and he so prevailed in Africk, that he got leisure to make a step into Sicily. Many Towns in Sicily had embraced a desire of recovering their liberty; thinking it high time to fight at length for their own freedom, after that they had so long been exposed, (as a reward of victory) either unto Aliens, or to Tyrants of their own Country. These had prevailed far, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the coming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good success in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of Sicily he returned into Africk, where his affairs stood in very bad terms. Archagathus, his son had lost a battel; and (which was worse) had ill means to help himself: his Army being in mutiny for lack of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great booty and spoil. It had now been time for him to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtain, they would (questionless) have given to him both money enough to pay his Army, and all that they then held in Sicily. For this City had been distressed, not only by this his war, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himself Tyrant over them. But ambition is blind. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed upon the conquest of Carthage it self: out of which dream he was awakened, by the loss of a battel, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange events following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this war, had renewed their old sacrifices of children to Saturn: from which they had abstained ever since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners taken in the battel, to offer unto the said Idol, in way of thankfulness to their victory. The fire, with which these unhappy men were consumed, caught hold upon the lodgings nearest unto the Altar, and spreading it self farther through the Camp, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult as is usual in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt up the Pavilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away, each of them believing, that the noise in the adverse Camp, was a sign of the enemies coming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a late retreat: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new calamity. In the beginning of this his flight in the dark, he met with his own African Souldiers; and thinking them to be enemies, (as indeed the one half of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battel) he began to assail them, and was so stoutly resisted, that he lost in this blind fight above four thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart, that, being fallen from the near hope of taking the City of Carthage, unto some distrust of his own safety, he knew no more how to moderate his present weak fears, than lately he had known how to govern his ambition. Therefore he took the way that came next into his head; which was to steal closely aboard his ships, with his younger son (the elder he suspected of Inceit, and of Ambition) and so to flye into Sicily, thinking it the best course to shift for himself, as wanting vessels wherein to transport his Army. His elder son Archagathus, perceiving his drift, arrested him and put him under custody.

but by means of a sudden tumult, he was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his sons behind him. His flight being noyed through the Army, all was in an uproar; and extremity of rage caused not only the common Soldier, but even such as had been friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold upon his two sons, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extremely base, I need not use words to prove: That his fear was truly, as all fear is said to be, a passion, depriving him of the succours which reason offered, the sequel doth manifest. His forsaken Soldiers, being now a headless company, and no longer an Army to be feared, obtained nevertheless a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteen talents. Likewise, Agathocles himself, having lost his Army, did nevertheless, by the reputation of this late war, make peace with Carthage upon equal terms.

After this, the Tyrant being delivered from foreign enemies, discovered his bloody nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants and his fears, urged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoils of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. He devised new engines of torment; wherein striving to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of brass, that should serve to scorch mens bodies, and withall give him leave to behold them in their misery. So devilish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slave to his brutish affections. In these mischiefs he was so outrageous, that he neither spared Sex, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africa. But this was not the way to preserve his estate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of their Country took arms against him, and drove him into such fears, that he was fain to seek that love at Carthage, which by ruling well he might have had in Sicily. He freely delivered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Towns of the Phœnicians in Sicily, belonging unto them, which were in his possession. They required him honourably, with great store of corn, and with four hundred talents of gold and silver. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he prevailed against the Rebels, and settled his estate. Having no further business left in Sicily, he made a voyage into Italy. There he subdued the Bruttians, rather by terror of his name than by any force, for they yielded at his first coming. This done, he went to the life of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great sum, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoil the Temples of their gods. Herein (methinks) he did well enough. For how could he believe those to be gods, that had continually given deaf ears to his horrible perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleven ships laden with gold: all which, and all the rest of the fleet, were cast away by foul weather at Sea; one Gally excepted, in which he himself escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. Agrius sickness fell upon him, that rotted his whole body, spreading it self through all his veins and sinews. Whilst he lay in this case, all deferring his end, save only Theogenia (a wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the son of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a younger son of his own, began to contend about the Kingdom. Neither did they seek to end the controversy by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laid wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he slew his Uncle, and got his Grandfathers Kingdom, without asking any leave. These tydings wounded the heart of Agathocles with fear and sorrow. He saw himself without help, like to become a prey to his ungacious Nephew, from whom he knew that no favour was to be expected, either by himself, or by those, whom only he now held dear, which were Theogenia and her children. Therefore he advised her and them to fly before they were surprised: for that otherwise they could by no means avoid, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gave them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he even compelled them (weeping to leave him desolate in so wretched a case) to embark themselves hastily, and make speed into Egypt. After their departure, whether he threw himself into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him, but he ended his life as basely, as obscurity, and in as much want as he first began it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamerines, his Soldiers, traitorously occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the Island. Then also did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicily. What the Nephew of Agathocles tho did, I cannot find. Likely it is that he quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driven to lend for Pyrrius to help them, who had married with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrius was soon weary of the Country (as hath been shewed before) and therefore left it: prophesying that it would become a goodly champion field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiority. In which business, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our story will declare.

§. V.

A recontinuon of the Roman War in Sicily. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsook the Carthaginians, and made his peace with Rome.

When Appius Claudius, following the advantage of his victory gotten at Messana, brought the War unto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great City; Hieron found it high time for him to seek peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himself by what means he could, when they were not in case to give him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without fear of molestation, whilst Rome and Carthage were fighting for the mastery. In this good mood the new Roman Consuls, M. Valerius, and C. Otacilius found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made use of their present advantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consuls had brought a great Army into Sicily; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring over Hieron to their side. If the Syracusan held them busied (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the sum of money imposed upon him, and by their performing none other piece of service) all the whole time of their abode in the Island; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no less to his honour, than it was to his commodity. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his own Kingdom to run into manifest peril of subversion, for their sakes that should have received all the profit of the victory: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger without training themselves to give him relief. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proof of the strength of Syracuse, in the dayes of Agathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to bear a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slack, in sending help: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their own work might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the besieged City was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had been when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason to try the uttermost hazard of war against the Carthaginians, who fought no other thing than to bring it into slavery: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient if they could withdraw it from the party of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathocles, or by Hieron. The former of these cared not what the Citizens endured, so long as he might preserve his own tyranny: the latter, as a just and good Prince, had no greater desire than to win the love of his people by seeking their commodity; but including his own felicity within the publick, laboured to uphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to pass that he enjoyed a long and happy reign, living dear to his own Subjects, beloved of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himself, ere he left their society, made unwilling to seek his ruin; or their more earnest business with the Romans, made unable to compass it.

§. VI.

How the Romans besiege and win Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintain a fleet. Their first loss, and first victory by sea. Of sea-fight in general.

Hieron, having sided himself with the Romans, aideth them with victuals and other necessities: so that they, presuming upon his assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians find it high time to besirr them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troops they had in Spain, to come to their aid; who being arrived, they made the City of Agrigentum the seat of the War, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Consuls, having made peace with Hieron, return into Italy; and, in their places, Lucius Postumus and Quintus Mamilius arrive. They go on towards

* Agrigen.

Agri-entum; and finding no enemy in the field, they besiege it, though it were stuffed with fifty thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of harvest being come, a part of the Roman Army range the Country to gather corn, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians sally furiously, and endanger the Roman Army, but are in the end repelled into the Town with great loss; but by the smart felt on both sides, the Assailants redoubled their guards, and the besieged kept within their cover. Yet the Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deep trench between the walls of the City and their Camp: and another on the outside thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force them suddenly, by a sally; nor those of the Country without, break upon them unawares: which double Defence kept the besieged also from the receiving any relief of victuals, and munitions, whilst the Syracusan supplies the assailants with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage, after they had been in this fort pent up five months. The Carthaginians embark an Army, with certain Elephants, thephants, under the command of Hanno; who arrives with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agri-entum. Hanno put himself into the field, and surpriseth Erbesus, a City wherein the Romans had bestowed all their provision. By means hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agri-entum; and the Roman Camp no less straightly assailed by Hanno, than the City was by the Romans: inasmuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had been forced to abandon the siege. But seeing ever; and that this distress was not enough to make them rise, Hanno determined to give them battle. To which end departing from Heraclea, he makes approach unto the Roman Camp. The Romans resolve to sustain him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horsemen to change the Vanguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to return to the Temples, and Theatres, Water-conduits, and Fish-ponds: the ruins whereof at this day are sufficient arguments, that Rome it self could never boast of the like. In the Porch of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius; (by which we may judge of the Temple it self) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods; all cut out in polished marble of divers colours; a work the most magnificent and rare that ever hath been seen: on the other side, the war of Troy, and the encounters which hapned at that siege; with the perfections of the Heroes that were deen in that war; all of the like beautiful stone; and of equal stature to the bodies of those men in ancient times: In comparison of which, the latter works of that kind, are but petty things, and meer trifles. It would require a volume to express the magnificence of the Temples of Heracles, Acropolis, Concord, Jean Lucina, Castility, Prospicity, Callio, and Pallas; where the Masterpieces of those exquisite Painters and Carvers Phidias, Zevax, Mys, and Polycletus, were to be seen. But in private time it ran the same fortune that all other great Cities have done, and was ruined by divers calamities of war: whereof this war present brought it to its end.

as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay disposed behind some rising ground. The Numidians perform it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Numidians, Hanno gives upon them, and having slaughtered many, bears the rest into their trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two months, but lay strongly encamped, waiting until some opportunity should invite them. But Annibal that was besieged in Agri-entum, as well by signs as messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremity which he endured, was able to brook such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, provoked the Consuls to fight: But his Elephants being disordered by his own Vanguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day: and with such as escaped, he recovered Heraclea. Annibal perceiving this, and remaining hopeless of succour, resolved to make his own way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this dayes victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; he ruht out of the Town, with all the remainder of his Army, and past by the Roman camp without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vain: sure they were, that he could not carry the City with him, which with little a-do the Romans entred, and pitifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victory, pursued rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this War, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keep the Carthaginians from their own coasts: but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicily; and from thence, being favoured with the wind of good success, to sail over into Africa. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and also of private men, to covet the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the desire of that which we neither have nor need, taking from us the true use and fruition of what we have already. This curse upon mortal men, was never taken from them since the beginning of the World unto this day.

To prosecute this War, Lucius Valerius and Titus Otacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicily. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many in-land Towns gave themselves unto them. On the contrary, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their own coasts, often invaded by the African fleets, as to equal themselves in every kind of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune favoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in ship-wrights craft, a storm of wind thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five banks, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a pattern, and by it they began to set up an hundred Quinqueremes which were Gallies, rowed by five on every bank; and twenty, of three on a bank: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed upon the Sea-sands many seats, in order of the banks in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beat the sand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learn the stroke of the Gally, and how to mount and draw their Oars.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new consuls (for they changed every year) was made Admiral: who being more in love with this new kind of warfare, than well advised, past over to Messana with seventeen Gallies, leaving the rest to follow him. There he stayed not, but would needs row along the coast to Lipara, hoping to do some piece of service. Hannibal a Carthaginian was at the same time Governor in Panormus; who being advertised of this new Sea-mans arrival, sent forth one Boodes, a Senator of Carthage, with twenty Gallies, to entertain him. Boodes, falling upon the Consul unawares, took both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good news, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Consul; he grew no less foolishly hardy than Cornelius had been. For he, fancying to himself to surprize the rest of the Roman fleet, on their own coast, ere they were yet in all points provided; fought them out with a fleet of fifty sail: wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and leaving the greater number of his own behind him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twenty Gallies, the Romans under Cornelius had lost but seventeen, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fifty.

The Romans, being advertised of Cornelius his overthrow, make haste to redeem him, but give the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Dnilius, considering that the Roman vessels were heavy and slow, the African Gallies having the speed of them, devised a certain Engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapple themselves with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done the weightier ships had gotten the advantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftness serve them, nor their Manniners craft; the vessels wherein both Nations fought, being open: so that all was to be carried by the advantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heavier Gallies were accidentally likely to crush, and crack the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by the reason of their breadth, more steady; and those that best kept their feet, could also best use their hands. The example may be given between one of the long boats of his Majesties great ships, and a London-Barge.

Certainly, he that will happily perform a fight at Sea, must be skilful in making choice of Vessels to fight in: he must believe that there is more belonging to a good man of War, upon the waters, than great daring; and must know, that there is a great deal of difference, between fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Guns of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of War: for by such an ignorant bravery was Peter Strofle lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marques of Santa Cruz. In like sort, had the Lord Charles Howard, Admiral of England, been lost in the year 1588, if he had not been better advised, than a great many malignant fools were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Army aboard them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he intangled himself with those great and powerful Vessels, he had greatly endangered this Kingdom of England. For twenty men upon the defences, are equal to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twenty of ours to defend themselves withall. But our Admiral knew his advantage, and held it: which had he not done, he had not been worthy to have held his head. Here to speak in general of Sea-fights (for particulars are fitter for private hands than for the Press,) I say, that a fleet of twenty ships, all good sailers, and good ships, have the advantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships and of lower sailing. For if the fleet of an hundred sail keep themselves near together, in a gross squadron; the twenty ships, charging ing them upon any angle, shall force them to give ground, and to fall back upon their own next fellows: of which so many as intangle, are made unrevivable or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twenty ships, which give themselves scope, after they have given one broad side of Artillery, by clapping into the wind, and staying, they may give them the other: and so the twenty ships batter them in pieces with a perpetual volley; whereas those that fight in a troop, have no room to turn, and can always use but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of an hundred fall give themselves any distance, then shall the lesser fleet prevail, either against those that are rear and hindmost, or against those, that by advantage of over-sailing their fellows keep the wind, and if upon a Lee-shore, the ships next the wind: be constrained to fall back into their own Squadron, then it is all to nothing, the whole fleet must suffer shipwreck, or render it self. That such advantage may be taken upon a fleet of unequal speed, it hath been well enough conceived in old time; as by the Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, when he made to the Syracusanians, when the Athenians invaded them, it may easily be observed.

Of the Art of War by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord Henry, Prince of Wales; a subject, to my knowledge, never handled by any man, ancient or modern: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his loss; by the loss of that brave Prince; of which, like an Eclipse of the Sun, we shall find the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equal words and sorrows; I will therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him. Cum leve loquuntur, ingentes supent.

But it is now time to return to the beaten Carthaginians; who by losing their advantage of (swift boats, and boarding the Romans, have lost fifty fail of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies by commanding the Seas, have gotten liberty to fall about the West part of Sicily; where they raised the siege laid unto Segesta by the Carthaginians; and won the Town of Maclea, with some other places.

Drivers Enterfate: of War, between the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable success. The Romans prepare to invade Africa: and obtain a great Victory at Sea.

THE Victory of Dutius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Naval Triumph, that was ever seen in that City: so gave it unto the Romans great incouagement, to proceed in their Wars by Sea; whereby they hoped, not only to get Sicily, but all the other Isles between Italy and Africa, beginning with Sardinia, whither loon after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar, the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might help to recompence the late misfortune: and being advertised, that some quarrel was grown between the Roman Soldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incamp apart, he sent forth Hanno to set upon them; who taking them unawares, buried four thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-war in Sicily, Hannibal, who had lately been beaten by Sea, but escaped unto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former error, obtained the trust of a new fleet, wherewith he arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Island, the Romans had entertained for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Sea from Sicily, arrived in the Port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They set upon him unawares, and took the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himself hardly escaping the danger. But it little availed him to have escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second unfortunate voyage, that they hanged him up for his diligence: for (as Writer, it hath been said of old) Non est hic in bello peccare; In War it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Consuls, till * Pa- is one of the first Cities that hath been built in all Egypt. For, whereas Thucydides seems to make it a Colony of the Phoenicians; Strabo, in the sixth of Parvus, lib. 6. affirms that it was first and long before the time which Thucydides sets down for the Phoenicians, and Dioscorides. To prove which, he tells us of two inscriptions upon the Hebrew Character found at Parvus, in the time of William the second, King of Sicily, that were then beheld of all the Citizens and other strangers, which being translated into Latine, lay as followeth; Vixit Isaac filius Abrabe, et regnavit in Idume, atque in valle Damascene, et filius Isaac filius, regnavit Idumeorum manu, quibus adiuncti sunt multi Damasceni, et filii Phoenices, profecti in hanc viciniam infulam, fides perpetua locaverunt in hac amoenissima loco, quem Panormum nominaverunt. In the other Marble are found these words; Non est alius Deus prater unum Deum; non est alius pater prater eundem Deum, etc. Hicque Turis Profecti in Idumeam filius Eliphaz, filius Isaac fratris Jacob filius Isaac, filius Abraham. Turis quidem hic nomen est Baruch, sed Turis hinc proxime nomen est Phoenice. And this inscription (saith Facellus) was found intire in the Castle Baruch, in the year 1534. Now whether these inscriptions were truly as ancient, as these men believe they were, I leave every man to his own faith. But that the City was of aged times, it appears by Thucydides, who affirmeth, when the Greeks pulled first into Sicily, that then the Phoenicians inhabited Panormus: which certain it is they did in the first Punic war: to wit, the Carthaginians who were Phoenicians, from whom the Romans Drusus besieged Syracuse, he sent him in aid 3000 Soldiers. But it was rather confederate, than friendly to the Romans. For Cleop against Portus, names it among the free Cities of Sicily. After Syracuse destroyed, it became the first City, and Regal Seat, as well of the Gauls and Syracusanians in that Island, as of the Emperors of Constantinople: of the Romans, Franks, and Armenians, which how it holds this day, and is much frequented, for the excellent wine which grows about it.

normus was besieged; where, when the Romans had sought in vain to draw the Carthaginians into the field; being unable to force that great City, because of the strong Garrison therein belowered: they then departed from thence, and took certain Inland Towns, as Alyscistratus, Enna, Camerina, Hippana, and others, between Panormus and Messana.

The year following, C. Atilius the Consul who commanded the Roman fleet, discovered a company of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coast: and, not staying for his whole number purified them with ten of his. But he was well beaten for the haste he made, and lost all, save the Gally which transported him: wherein himself escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Atilius his fleet was gotten up: who renewing the fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the Victory remaining doubtful, both challenge it. Now to try at once, which of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a fleet of three hundred and thirty Gallies; the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fifty. * Triremes, Quadriremes, and Quinqueremes.

* The Quinqueremes are Gallies, wherein every Oar have five men to draw it: the Quadriremes had four to an Oar: and the Triremes three.

Some have thought, that the Quinqueremes had five ranks of Oars, one over another; and the other Gallies (rateably) fewer. But had this been so, they must then have had five decks each over other, which hath seldom been seen in ships of a thousand tons; neither could the third, fourth, and fifth ranks, have reached unto the water with the Oars.

The Romans resolve to transport the War into Africa; the Carthaginians, to arrest them on the coast of Sicily. The numbers, with which each of them filled their fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that ever fought on the waters. By Polybius his estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fifty thousand: Reckoning one hundred and twenty Soldiers, and three hundred Rowers to every Gally, one with the other. The Roman fleet was divided into four parts, of which the first made the form of a Wedge or Point, the two first squadrons making the Flanks, and the third Squadron, the Base: the point thereof (wherein were the two Consuls as Admirals) looking toward the enemy, and the middle space lying empty. Their Vessels of carriage were towed by the third Squadron. After all came up the fourth, in form of a Crescent; very well manned, but exceeding thin: so that the horns of it inclosed all the third Squadron, together with the corner of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian Fleet I cannot receive by relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I conjecture, that the front of their Fleet was thin, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en haye, a long front of horse, and thin: which form, since the Pistol prevailed over the Lance, they have changed. Behind this first out-stretched front, their Battalions were more solid: for Amilcar, Admiral of the Carthaginians had thus ordered them, of purpose, his Gallies having the speed of the Romans) that, when the first Fleet of the Romans halted to break through the first Gallies, they should all turn tail, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victory) disorder themselves, and, for eagerness of taking the Run-aways, leave their own three squadrons far behind them. For so it must needs fall out; seeing that the third Squadron towed their horse-boats and victuallers; and the fourth had the Rearward of all. According to Amilcar's direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken the thin front of the Carthaginian first Fleet, which ran away, they forthwith gave after them with all speed possible, not so much as looking behind them for the second Squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawn near unto the body of the Carthaginian Fleet, led by Amilcar, and by him (at the first) received a great loss, until their second Squadron came up, which forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oars. Hanno also who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian Fleet, invaded the Roman Rearward, and prevailed against them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcus Atilius fell back to their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their heels; as not able to sustain both squadrons. The Rear being relieved, the Consuls came to the aid of their third Battalion, which towed their victuallers, which were also in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: but the Consuls, joining their squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part also to running.

This victory fell unto the Romans, partly by the hardiness of their Soldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, being first beaten, could never after joyn himself unto any of his other squadrons, that remained, as yet in a fair likelihood of prevailing, so long as they fought upon equal terms, and but Squadron to Squadron. But Amilcar forsaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Roman Fleet unengaged, and ready to give succour to any of the other parts that were oppressed. So as in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day : for they lost but four and twenty of theirs ; whereas the Africans lost thirty that were sunk , and threefold and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar who had more Gallies than the Romans , had also divided his Fleet into four squadrons, (besides those that ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to engage them) and that, whilst he himself fought with one Squadron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies Fleet had been at the same time entertained, he had prevailed : but the second Squadron, being free, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilcar was oppressed : and Amilcar, being oppressed and scattered, the Consuls had good leisure to relieve both the third and the fourth Squadron, and got the victory.

Charis the fifth, among other the Precepts to Philip the second his Son, where he advised him concerning War against the Turks , tells him, that in all battels between them and the Christians , he should never fail to charge the Janissars in the beginning of the fight, and to engage them at once with the rest. For (saith he) the Janissars , who are always reserved intire in the Rear of the battel, and in whom the Turks reposest his greatest confidence; come up in a gobs body, when all the troops on both sides are disbanded and in confusion ; whereby they carry the Victory before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reservation, did the Romans also prevail against other Nations. For they kept their Triarii in store (who were the choice of their Army) for the up-shot and last blow. A great and victorious advantage it hath even been found, to keep some one or two good troops to look on, when all else are disbanded and engaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans prevail in Africk. Atilius the Consul, propounds intolerable conditions of Peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten and made prisoner.

NOW the Romans , according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their Fleet, set sail for Africa , and arrived at the Promontory of Hercules , a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage , and some forty leagues from Heraclia in Sicily , where Amilcar himself as yet staid. From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontory , till they came to Clypea , a Town about fifty English mile from it. There they disembarked and prepared to besiege Clypea ; which to ease them of labour, was yielded unto them. Now had they a Port of their own on Africa side ; without which all invasions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their own Carthage , fearing that the Roman Fleet and Army had directed themselves thither : but being advertised that they had taken Clypea , they made provisions of all forts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans send to Rome for directions, and in the mean while wait all round about them. The order given for the Senate, was, That one of the Consuls should remain with the Army, and that the other should return with the Fleet into Italy. According to this direction, Manlius the Consul is sent hometo Rome ; whither he carried with him twenty thousand African Captains, with all the Roman Fleet and Army ; except forty ships, fifteen thousand foot, and five hundred horse, that were left with Atilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily won some Towns and places that were unwall'd, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter before he came to Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that near unto the River of Brasada , he encountered with a S. spent of one hundred and twenty foot long, which he slew, not without loss of many Souldiers, being driven to use against it such engines of War, as served properly for the assaulting of Towns. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Army, whereof the Captains were Hanno and Hofar , together with Amilcar , who had brought over out of Sicily five thousand foot, and five hundred horse to succour his Country. These (belike) had an intent, rather to weary him out of Africa , by wary protraction of time, than to undergo the hazard of a main fight. They were careful to hold themselves free from necessity of coming to blows : yet had they a great desire to save the Town of Adis out of his hands. Involving therefore to follow their general purpose, and yet to disturb him in the siege of Adis , they incamp near unto him, and (strongly as they think) on the top of an hill : but thereby they lose the services both of their Elephants, and of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs, Regulus discovers, and makes use of it. He assails them in their strength, which they defend a while, but in fine the Romans prevail, and force them from the place, taking the spoil of their Camp. Following this their good fortune at the heels, they the fifth in the year 1136. and was one of the three Keyes, which he gave in charge to Philip the second his son to keep safe ; to wit ; this gave in charge to Philip : Flushing , the Key of the Netherlands : and Kidex , the Key of Spain. But two of these Philip so lost, that he never found them again ; the third our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queen Elizabeth , to wing out of his hand ; where we stayed not to pick any lock, but brake open the doors, and having rifled all, shew it into the fire.

By the loss of this battail at Adis , and more especially by the loss of Tunis , the Carthaginians were greatly dismayed. The Numidians , their next Neighbours towards the West, insult upon their misfortunes ; invade, and spoil their Territory, and force those that inhabit abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius finds his own advantage, and assures himself that the City could not long hold out : yet he feared lest he might defend it self, until his time of Office, that was near expired, should be quite run out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reap the honour of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it self, persuades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded unto them so unworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with fear, became now so courageous and disdainful, that they resolved, either to defend their liberty, or die to the last man. To strengthen their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troop of Greeks , whom they had formerly sent to entertain. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus , a Spartan : who being informed of what had passed, and of the overthrow which the Carthaginians received near unto Adis , gave it out publicly ; that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit, ran till it came to the Senate ; Xantippus is sent for ; gives the reason of his opinion ; and in conclusion, being made General of the African forces, he puts himself into the field. The Army which he led, consisted of no more than twelve thousand foot, and four thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces whereof the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Liberties ; Lives, Goods, Wives, and Children : which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were mis-numbered ; the one consisting of an hundred and forty thousand, and the other of an hundred and fifty thouland, were it not commonly found that they which use the service of mercenary Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their own doors.

Xantippus , taking the field with his Army, marched directly towards the Romans ; and ranging his troops upon fair and level ground, fitted both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them batrel. The Romans wondered much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow : but confident they were ; that it should soon be abated. Their chief care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites , or light-armed Souldiers, as a forlorn hope ; that these might either with darts and other casting weapons, drive back the beasts upon the enemies, or at least break their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely upon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battails deeper in file, than they had been accustomed to do. By which means, as they were the less subject unto the impression of the Elephants ; so were they so much the more exposed unto the violence of the horse, wherein the enemy did far exceed them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus , all in one rank, before his Army ; which followed them at a reasonable distance : his horsemen, and some light-armed foot, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onset was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so unable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battail was helpful. For when the beasts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks ; the squadrons nevertheless persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, having at the first encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, driven those of Atilius out of the field, began to charge the Roman battalions in flank, and put them in great distress ; who being forced to turn face every way, could neither pass forward nor yet retire ; but had very much ado to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the mean while, such of the Romans , as had escaped the fury of the Elephants, and left them at their backs, fell upon the Carthaginian Army, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered Company, wearied with labour and hurt ; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to have dealt with the enemy upon equal terms. Here was

therefore a great slaughter with little fight; the Romans hastily recoiled to the body of their Army, which being surrounded with the enemy, and spent with travail, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of these troops, that open the way to a general overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victory; destroying the whole Roman Army, save two thousand, and taking five hundred prisoners, together with Attilius the Consul. Of their own they lost no more than eight hundred Mercenaries, which were slain when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romans: that wheeling about to avoid the Elephants, bare down all before them: and made way even to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Army behind them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slain. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no less her vassals, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent soever they had been in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperity, which thencever gave nor fold to any mortal man. With what joy these newes were welcomed, when they came to Carthage, we may easily conjecture; and what great things the virtue of one man hath often brought to pass in the world, there are many examples to prove, no less than this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that sentence of Enrypedes, Mens una sapiens, plurimum vincit manus; Many mens hands equal not one wise mind.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus, returned into Greece; whether for that he was more envied than honoured, or for what other cause, it is unknown.

The death of Attilius Regulus the Consul, was very memorable. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransom of prisoners on both sides: giving his faith to return if the business were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly saw that his Country should lose by the bargain: so far was he from urging the Senate unto compassion of his own misery, that he earnestly perswaded to have the prisoners in Africa left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where for his pains taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancy and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seem to have judged him an obstinate and malicious enemy, that neither in his prosperity would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamity would have the natural care, to preserve himself and others, by yielding to such an office of humanity, as is common in all wars (not grounded upon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small advantage. Whatsoever the Carthaginians thought of him; sure it is that his faithful observance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that grave speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of prisoners, appears, in all reason, to have proceeded from a vain-glorious forwardness, rather than from any necessity of State. For the exchange was made soon after his death; wherein the Romans had the worse bargain, by so much as Regulus himself was worth. As for the authority of all Historians, that magnify him in this point; we are to consider, that they lived under the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extremest torments, could not be more grievous to him, than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither do I think that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein; otherwise than by recrimination: saying, that the Romans deserved to be no better intreated, for as much as it is their ordinary practice to use others in the like sort. Cruelty doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customary. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead, the Captains of their enemies whom they took, yea, although they were such as had always made fair wars with them. Wherefore it seems not meet, in reason, that they should cry out against the like tyrannical insolency in others, as if it were lawful only in themselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Attilius his intolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians fear was changed by meer desperation; calls to remembrance, the like insolency of others in prosperity, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath been denied. In such cases I never hold it impertinent, to add unto one, more reflections; approving the true rules, from which our passions carry us away.

In the year 1378. the Genovais won so fast upon the Venetians, as they not only drave their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their own fleet within two miles of Venice itself. This bred such an amazement in the City of Venice, that they offered unto the Genovais (their state reserved) whatsoever they would demand. But Peter Doria, blown blown up with many former victories, would hearken to no composition; save the yielding of their City and State to his discretion. Hereupon the Venetians, being filled with disdain, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and assailed Doria with such desperate fury, that they break his fleet, Doria himself, take nineteen of his Gallies, fourscore boats of Padoa, and four thousand prisoners, recover Chioggia, and all the places taken from them; and following their victory, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genovais barely to beg peace, to their extremest dishonour and disadvantage, being beaten; and, being victorious, they might have commanded, to their greatest honour and advantage. The like hapned to the Earl of Flanders, in the year 1380. when having taken a notable, and withal an over-cruel revenge upon the Gantois, he refused mercy to the rest, who in all humility, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their City, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had unadvisedly refused, and was resolved to extinguish them utterly; they issue out of their City with five thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earl, break his Army, enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquished followers; and enforce him to hide himself under an heap of straw, in a poor cottage; out of which with great difficulty he escaped, and saved himself. Such are the fruits of Insolency.

How the affairs of Carthage prospered after the victory against Attilius: How the Romans, having lost their fleet by tempest, resolve to forsake the Sea: The great advantages of a good fleet in war, between Nations divided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late victory, all places that had been lost in Africa, return to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clypea stands out; before which the Carthaginians sit down, and assail it, but in vain: For the Romans, hearing of the loss of Attilius, with their forces in Africa; and withal, that Clypea was besieged, make ready a gross Army, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and fifty Gallies, commanded by M. Emilius, and Ser. Fulvius, their Consuls. At the Promontory of Mercury, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out purpose, upon the bruit of their coming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romans took by force an hundred and fourteen of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their own men that had been besieged: and this done, they made amain toward Sicily, in hope to recover all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hasty voyage they despite the advice of the Pilots, who pray them to find harbour in time, for that the season threatened some violent storms, which ever hapned between the rising of Orion, and of the * Dog-star. Now although the Pilots of the Roman fleet had thus forewarned them of the weather at hand, and certified them withal, that the South coast of Sicily had no good Ports, wherein to save themselves upon such an accident: yet this of victorious Nation was perswaded, that the wind and seas feared them no less, than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer Elements themselves. So refusing to stay within some Port, as they were advised, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation, after this victory against the Carthaginian fleet, to take a few worthless Towns upon the coast. The merciles winds in the mean while overtake them, and near unto Camerina, overturn and thrust headlong on the rocks, all but fourscore of three hundred and forty ships, so as their former great victory was devoured by the most of the Sea; before the same thereof recovered Rome.
